Statements of this character have the tendency of urging people to buy more for fear that prices will be higher.

The Secretary of Agriculture refuses to take any positive action to secure an increase in the production of livestock. Instead, he wants controls restored, which recent experience shows will curtail production and reestablish black markets on a Nation-wide scale.

Inflation is a serious matter. It has destroyed many countries and it may destroy ours unless proper remedies are promptly applied. President Truman and his New Deal associates are making a political football of this vital matter by placing the blame on the Eightieth Congress, which has been in control for less than 2 years. He does not state that he and his New Deal predecessor have had control over the machinery of Government and the economy of the country for the past 16 years. He does not state that the inflationary spiral is largely due to policies initiated by the New Deal during the 16-year period. He refuses to use the controls which he now possesses to stop the inflationary spiral and to put into operation policies that will insure abundant production of meat, food, and other necessities for American consumers. Since the welfare of the Nation is at stake, all parties and persons should work together for its solution in the interests of the general welfare.

EXPORTS OF GRAIN AND FOOD

I state again that the Truman administration should be honest with the people and tell them the reasons for our shortages and high prices. American people are anxious to help hungry people in the rest of the world. They have demonstrated their willingness to do so. But they want to be sure that hungry people actually receive the food taken from our economy and paid for by American taxpayers.

From July 1, 1946, to June 30, 1947, we exported 410,432,000 bushels of wheat, 112,133,000 bushels of corn, 17,079,000 bushels of barley and malt, 573,000 bushels of rye, 27,071,000 bushels of oats, and 18,387,000 bushels of grain sorghums which equaled 15,021,000 long tons of grains. Had this grain been used in the United States for feeding cattle and hogs, the per capita supply of meat would have been increased by around 28 pounds. If half of it had been used the American consumers would each have had 14 pounds more meat. Over 15,000,000 long tons of grains were shipped out of the country between July 1, 1947, and June 30, 1948. If this grain had been used in the United States to feed livestock, our supply of beef, pork, poultry, and dairy products would have been materially increased, which would have resulted in lower prices to American consumers. Without question, the exporting of more than 30,000,000 long tons of grain in 2 years has had a tremendous effect upon our supplies of livestock products and prices in this country.

As we know it, grain means beef, pork, milk, butter, cheese, eggs, and poultry for American consumers. By taking this tremendous amount of grain out of the country serious repercussions have occurred, and we might as well be honest about it.

The Secretary of Agriculture, Brannan, stated the following before a House committee:

I do not think you can say that the export of grains as such is the fact which has increased the cost of living or food to the American people.

Bearing in mind that we have shipped out nearly 1,200,000,000 bushels of grain during the past 2 years, it seems rather strange that Secretary Brannan should make such a definite statement, when you consider the following quotation from him. The Washington Star for February 5, 1948, quotes Mr. Brannan as follows:

Mr. Brannan argues that when distillers buy grain it sets off a chain running like this: Grain prices tend to go up. That means prices for meat, eggs, chickens, and milk are pushed up because cattle and chickens eat grain.

Between 40,000,000 and 60,000,000 bushels of grain are used for industrial and other alcohol. I agree that it sets off a chain reaction when grain is diverted from food production. However, it is a little difficult to reconcile this position with Mr. Brannan's former statement that the export of 1,200,000,000 bushels of grain in a 2-year period does not have any appreciable effect upon the price of meat, dairy, and poultry products. Of course, the effect of removing such large quantities of grain from this country, although for a worthy cause, plays an important part in creating shortages of feed and higher prices for meat, dairy, and poultry products.

Secretary Brannan made a lengthy statement before the Joint Committee on the Economic Report on February 5, 1948, a part of which is hereafter quoted:

My discussion today will deal primarily with domestic problems. Therefore, I should point out that the wasteful use of grain can only mean higher prices for the foods we eat here at home. Perhaps I should state it this way: We cannot hope to control inflation in food if we permit grain to be diverted to nonessential use. The paramount domestic problem facing the country today is to control the inflationary rise in food prices, particularly meat. Because feed is the source of the large part of our meat and livestock products, the supply of feed determines how much of these food products can come to our tables. * * *

The less food we have, the more we must pay for what we eat. This is the simplest explanation of the inflationary rise in the prices that already has carried meat beyond the purchasing power of many American families.

It is very difficult to visualize the enormous quantity of food which has been exported from this country during the past 2 years from July 1, 1946, to June 30, 1948. The Secretary of Agriculture in his publication entitled "Grain Conservation on Farms, 1947–48" has described it best as follows:

The physical quantity of food exports last year (1946–47) accounted for 13.4 percent of all food entering consumption channels in the United States. Civilians received 86.1 percent; the United States military services 1.1 percent; and United States Territories 0.4 percent.

Altogether, we exported 19,196,000 long tons of food—enough to make a solid freight train of food extending from San Diego, Calif., all the way across the country to Portland, Maine. This is an all time high record for food shipments.

While I have not secured the definite tonnage of food exported for the 1947–48 period, I am reliably informed that it will equal the shipments of 1946–47 described above by the Secretary. Therefore, for the 2-year period there would be two solid freight trains of food extending from San Diego, Calif., all the way across the country to Portland, Maine.

Since Secretary Brannan and others have been indulging in double talk, it might be well to quote a few statements by President Truman. On September 25, 1947, when appointing the Luckman committee, Mr. Truman had this to say:

In the face of this situation the Cabinet Committee on World Food Programs report shows that, without further action, we would be able to carry through a large export program; but, as a result of sharply reduced corn production and continued high domestic demand for grain, exports would not equal last year's total shipments—even though world needs are greater.

The United States cannot rest on this export prospect. To ship more abroad without adjustments in domestic demand, however, would aggravate our own price situation.

It is significant to notice that the President admits the obvious fact that shipments of increased grain abroad "would aggravate our own price situation." Since July 1946 to June 30, 1948, there have been shipped out of this country nearly 1,200,000,000 bushels of grain.

In his midyear economic report to Congress on July 30, 1948, President Truman said:

Thus, the impact of the aid program in the agricultural area, with its important bearing upon domestic food prices, is unlikely to be as serious as it has been. Nonetheless, it will have a substantial continuing effect in view of the extraordinarily high domestic demand.

As early as July 21, 1947, the President recognized the "upward pressure of prices" because of increased exports, by stating in his midyear economic report to Congress the following:

Occurring in a period of high domestic demand, the increase of exports contributed to the upward pressure on prices. This was particularly true of grains, for which the foreign requirements were most imperative.

I also desire to quote from the report of the Joint Committee on the Economic Report of Congress issued December 15, 1947:

The export of livestock feed grains has undoubtedly exercised some further influence in the export picture as a cause of meat-price increases. A short ton of feed grains will feed two hogs to market weight, and since each hog will contribute about 140 pounds of meat, the 4,202,000 metric tons of feed grains (other than wheat) exported last year were equivalent to about 8.8 pounds per capita, assuming this feed would have been fed to hogs. * * *

In addition to these factors affecting domestic supplies, the very large exports of wheat (greatest on record) are probably reducing the quantity of meat, poultry, and dairy products below levels that otherwise could have been achieved, and therefore are helping to increase the domestic prices of these products. However, it is probable that only a part of the feed grains exported would have been fed to livestock. Some would have been fed to poultry and to dairy animals, some used for industrial purposes, and a part would have gone into carry-over. Over a longer period, meat production would have been increased because of lower feed costs resulting from the more abundant domestic market supply.

I also want to call attention to a recent statement made by Commerce Secretary Sawyer opposing any increase in the shipment of Marshall plan food to Europe. He said to reporters:

It may now be time to give some attention to the interests of the American housewife.

This frank statement by Mr. Sawyer would indicate that the Truman administration has completely overlooked the interests of the American housewives and their need for food at reasonable prices. It is gratifying to note that one Cabinet member is interested in the welfare of 145,000,000 consumers in this country.

My colleague, Mr. JOHN MCCORMACK, of Massachusetts, has raised the question about exports of food during the war and since the termination of hostilities. It is his contention that we exported more food each year during the war than we have during the past 3 years. Mr. MCCORMACK should examine the following table on exports of certain foods which has been prepared by the Department of Agriculture. These statistics on exports cover the prewar period from 1935 and include exports up to July 1, 1948. It might be well for Mr. Truman to also study the table as he has contended that we shipped out around 300,000,000 bushels of grain each year prior to the war period.

TRUMAN ADMINISTRATION HAS PURSUED CONSISTENT RECORD URGING DECREASE IN LIVESTOCK RECORD

According to the Census Bureau, the population of the United States, exclusive of overseas occupation forces, has increased from 132,552,000 in 1944 to 146,116,000 in 1948. It should have been elementary to the Truman administration that with a gain of 14,000,000 in the human population during the past 5 years that more meat and dairy products would be required to take care of domestic consumption. Livestock production should have been encouraged. Instead, the Truman administration has pursued the consistent policy of urging decreases in production goals for livestock. American farmers look to the United States Department of Agriculture for their signal to produce.

A study of the United States Department of Agriculture table on production goals and actual production results, shown below, clearly demonstrates a large decrease in our livestock population. It further shows that we have been consuming our cattle inventories. It will take years to replace the breeding stock in the cattle field. If the present meat demand continues, and the population increases as rapidly in the next 5 years, we should have at least 95,000,000 head of cattle. It takes from 2 to 3 years to produce a good meat animal, and 3 years for a milk cow.

The cattle and calf population in the United States has decreased from 85,573,000 in 1945 to an estimated 76,500,000 on January 1, 1949. To further reduce the cattle supply for the coming months, the Truman administration has urged an additional decrease of 500,000 head. This recommendation was made by the Department of Agriculture on July 23, 1948. This would make the cattle population about 76,000,000 head on January 1, 1949.

To further illustrate what has happened to our meat supply under the New Deal policy of scarcity, I call your attention to the following table which outlines the number of meat animals per hundred persons in the United States over the last 7 years:

NEW DEAL POLICIES HAVE CAUSED GREATEST LIQUIDATION OF DAIRY CATTLE

President Truman places the blame on the Eightieth Congress for high food prices. Nothing could be further from the truth. Let us look at the record.

During normal times dairy farmers of the United States supply better than 40 percent of the veal and beef consumed in this country. They also produce the milk, butter, cheese, and other dairy products required for domestic consumption. They have also produced hundreds of millions of pounds of dairy products for export to people in war-devastated countries.

With the human population of the United States having increased approximately 14,000,000 since 1944, the milk cow population has decreased around 3,000,000 head since 1945. (See table below.) This decrease in milk cows has been due to unwise policies of the Truman administration; high feed prices caused by the export of approximately 1,200,000,000 bushels of grain, during the past 2 years; the short corn crop of 1947; and the Luckman program which called for feeding less grain to cattle, hogs, and poultry. The effect of these policies means less milk and other dairy products and higher prices. The estimated production of milk in 1948 is set at 116,000,000,000 pounds, compared with 121,504,000,000 pounds in 1945. Fewer cows produce less milk.

It takes around 3 years to raise a milk cow. There will be an abundance of feed for the next 12 months unless our surplus grains are all shipped out of the country. While feed will be relatively cheap, we do not have the milk cows or heifer calves to consume it.

Consumption of fluid milk has increased during the past 10 years. Prewar 1935–39 consumption of milk was 803 pounds per capita. It reached 920 pounds in 1945, and for 1948 it is estimated that it will be 794 pounds per capita. The 1935–39 per capita consumption of butter was 16.7 pounds, which will drop to an estimated 10.2 pounds in 1948.

Instead of urging a decrease in cattle population, the Truman administration should have encouraged increased production of dairy cattle, which would result in more dairy products for the consumers at favorable prices.

GOVERNMENT POLICIES CAUSED DRASTIC HOG REDUCTION

The most drastic decrease in meat production occurred in the case of hogs. Here again, Mr. Luckman took an important part. He claims that he succeeded in having the market weight of hogs reduced last fall from 276 pounds to 248 pounds. This resulted in higher prices for pork chops and hams, as well as a liquidation of breeding animals.

It all started back in 1943 under New Deal Administrator Chester Bowles, of the OPA. Mr. Bowles may be an expert advertising agent, but he knew little or nothing about hog production. American consumers are now paying for his folly.

Approximately 122,000,000 pigs were raised in 1943. The Government support price was then fixed at $13.75 a hundredweight. In the fall of 1943 the War Food Administrator announced that, effective October 1, 1944, the support of good to choice hogs would be lowered $1.25 per hundredweight to $12.50, and the Administrator urged farmers to produce 20 percent fewer hogs in 1944. Shortly after this announcement Chester Bowles stated in a letter to the editor of the New York Times, which was published on December 19, 1943, that when the hog support price lowered on October 1, 1944, "at the same time the ceiling price on hogs will be reduced correspondingly."

This action on the part of Bowles and the War Food Administrator caused a loss of confidence on the part of producers because of uncertainty and confusion in Government policies. This resulted in a decrease in hog production in 1944 to 86,000,000 head, as compared with 122,000,000 hogs in 1943.

The table below will show what has taken place in the production of hogs as a result of governmental interference. Considering the large demand for meat Government production goals have been far too low. Hog production in 1947 has been estimated by the Department of Agriculture at approximately 84,000,000, and for 1948 at 83,400,000. Without doubt, the Luckman program of reduced grain feeding, the large export of grains to Europe, the short corn crop of 1947, and high feed prices were responsible for the decrease in hog production.

If the large corn and grain crops materialize this fall, and there is no interference by the Government, farmers will increase hog production in 1949. It will be to their advantage to do so. Feed grains will be cheaper and the demand for pork will be great. It takes from 6 to 10 months to produce hogs for market, and more pork should therefore be available in 1949 at lower than existing prices.

GOVERNMENT ACTION DOMINATES LARD PRICE

An illustration of how completely Government action dominates the price of food is shown in the handling of lard for export during the fourth quarter of 1947. A Government committee determines the amount of lard and food for export each quarter of the year. The announcement of the 1947 fourth quarter allocation was made on September 10, 1947. While I am suspicious that certain speculators had advance information on what the Government intended to do prior to the public announcement, the facts are that lard was selling at around 18 cents a pound a week before the public announcement.

On September 10, 1947, the Secretary of Agriculture announced the doubling of the export allocation of lard, and within 30 days the price had advanced around 10 cents per pound. This governmental action brought higher prices for American consumers and a golden harvest for the speculators who went into the market prior to the Secretary's announcement.

SHEEP

The production of sheep and lambs is a vanishing industry in the United States. The sheep population in this country has decreased from 50,782,000 to an estimated 33,500,000 as of January 1, 1949. This is a national tragedy. This disaster is solely due to New Deal policies which have discouraged production of sheep and wool in the United States. It should be obvious to every consumer as to the reason for the higher price of lamb, and I will make no further comment.

LUCKMAN PROGRAM FORCES CURTAILMENT IN POULTRY PRODUCTION

The Luckman feed-less-grain-to-poultry program, sponsored by the Truman administration, coupled with high feed prices on account of the grain exports, achieved startling liquidation results in the case of chickens and turkeys. The table below shows an estimated decrease of 110,000,000 chickens and 7,000,000 turkeys for 1948 as compared with last year. This means higher prices for poultry in 1948.

While I recognize the difficulties in dealing with the poultry problem, it is quite apparent that the Truman administration has consistently urged farmers to produce less chickens and turkeys during the last 5 years. The result will be a reduction in both chickens and turkeys under the prewar 1935–41 average. This comes at a time when there is a scarcity of beef and pork, which will compel consumers to buy more poultry and eggs.

THE LUCKMAN-TRUMAN MEAT AND POULTRY REDUCTION PROGRAM

Without questioning the laudable objectives of the grain saving program initiated by Charles Luckman, president of the huge British-owned soap corporation, it is quite evident that this grain saving program brought about a decided reduction in our meat, dairy, and poultry supplies for 1948 and added flame to the inflationary spiral of prices of meat, dairy, and poultry products.

I am not criticizing the objectives of this program, but I feel that Mr. Truman and his Cabinet members as well as other supporters of the New Deal should be honest with the American people and tell them frankly the reasons for meat shortages and high prices.

The Luckman program called for the saving of 100,000,000 bushels of grain by feeding less grain to cattle, hogs, and poultry. Mr. Luckman boasts about having reduced the weight of hogs going to market from 276 to 248 pounds. This meant less meat in 1948 for American consumers. Chicken production has been reduced from 745,000,000 chickens in 1947 to an estimated 635,000,000 in 1948. Turkey production was reduced from 35,000,000 in 1947 to an estimated 28,000,000 in 1948. The result will be high priced turkeys for Thanksgiving this year as well as higher prices for poultry. All of this was due to the Luckman grain saving program and the export of nearly 600,000,000 bushels of grain in 1947–48 which brought about a shortage of feed and high prices and the tremendous reduction in chicken and turkey production and a liquidation of hogs, beef, and dairy cattle at lower weights. The people will remember Mr. Luckman.

MEAT SUPPLIES AND FUTURE PRICES

From all indications, American farmers will produce the largest grain crop in history. This is encouraging for consumers. The second largest wheat crop on record is being harvested. If present estimates prove correct and ideal weather continues for another 6 weeks, we may have the largest corn crop in the history of the country. The production of feed grains has also been satisfactory, and producers of livestock and poultry will be assured of abundant feed supplies at reasonable prices, unless the Truman administration decides to export large quantities of grain to Europe and other countries.

Many consumers, especially those who live in larger cities, who are not familiar with the production of meat, dairy products, and poultry, are of the opinion that these meat items should be immediately available at lower prices. They forget that it takes from 2 to 3 years to produce a beef animal and 3 years to raise a milk cow from the calf stage. It takes from 6 to 10 months to produce a hog ready for market, and poultry can be produced in a shorter time. There will no doubt be a seasonal increase in the late fall and winter of grass-fed cattle which may cause a leveling off of prices. Increased supplies and lower prices are predicted for 1949, but again I point out that it takes time to raise both beef and pork.

To give a composite picture of the livestock situation in this country with estimates as to inventories on hand on American farms, I show below a table from the Department of Agriculture which gives a rather clear picture of what we may expect.

The farmers of this country will do their part, as they have done so well during the past years. Farm work is hard work, and our governmental agencies in charge of fixing goals and handling farm problems should give every encouragement to secure abundant production of all types of food with the assurance that equitable prices would prevail for both producers and consumers. Abundant production to satisfy consumer demand is the only solution to stop the inflationary spiral.

THE SPECIAL SESSION OF CONGRESS

President Truman has called this special session of Congress for political purposes. From here on and until November 2, New Dealers will attack the record of the Eightieth Congress. The voters will be the judges of what this Congress did. I would like to quote here some comment by Walter Lippmann, a noted commentator, on Mr. Truman and the special session:

TODAY AND TOMORROW

(By Walter Lippmann)

THE TRICK

Mr. Truman called the special session in order to make the voters think that he would now be reducing retail prices if the Republicans would let him. The question is whether the voters will recognize the difference between a serious program to combat the inflation and a quite cynical political trick.

For the special session was a trick. The Truman program was not meant to be enacted, or administered, or enforced. Had Mr. Truman wanted it enacted, he would have consulted the leaders of Congress before he announced it. He would have rallied his own party and he would have conciliated the Republicans, and he would have negotiated with them. Had he expected to administer and enforce his program, he would have done something with the Treasury and the Federal Reserve Board to make them ready to administer and enforce it.

But what Mr. Truman wanted was not the hard and dangerous task of combating inflation. He wanted to be the candidate who stood for lower prices in the retail shops without having to do any of the disagreeable and unpopular things that would have to be done if retail prices are to be reduced.

That the program was quite insincere—that is to say, not intended for action—is evident. It proposed a return to rationing and price control. But the machinery of rationing and price control does not exist. He proposed a contraction of the money supply.

But Mr. Snyder and Mr. Eccles, who would have to perform the operation, are scarcely on speaking terms. The very program which was supposed to combat inflation contained a series of proposals to increase it—a big housing program, new expenditures for education, for old-age insurance, and a higher minimum wage. The program did not contain proposals to reduce purchasing power by raising income tax, by lowering the support of farm prices, and by reducing Government expenditures.

As a matter of fact the Truman program for the special session was concocted by his political advisers; it was not even the program of the Truman administration. Had it been in fact the Administration program, its sponsors would have been the agencies which would have to administer it—namely the Treasury and Federal Reserve Board. But Mr. Snyder damned it with faint praise; Mr. Eccles, who is the most serious and the most competent member of the Administration dealing with the subject, said frankly that the program was worthless. Mr. Paul Porter, who holds no office, was appointed the spokesman for the program—the theory being apparently, that since Mr. Porter had no power to act he could talk all the more freely.

Now that the special session is adjourned, one thing at least is settled conclusively. It is that right or wrong, for good reasons or bad, Mr. Truman is unable to work with Congress and to lead it. The Republicans are almost solidly against him. The Democrats are deeply divided behind him. Yet Mr. Truman will now attempt to convince the country that his inability to lead the Eightieth Congress is a reason why he should be elected for another 4 years. He will argue that the way out of the division and the disunion, the paralysis and impotence, is to keep in office the Administration which is identified with the division and the disunion, the paralysis and the impotence.

But even those who think Mr. Truman has a genuine remedy for the inflation will come to realize that with the Republicans against him and his own party divided, Mr Truman can do nothing effective against inflation. The more vehemently they dislike the record of the Eightieth Congress, the more evident it is that Mr. Truman can offer them nothing but the prospect of another 4 years of the same thing.

The remedy under our system of government for the Truman congressional deadlock is to elect a new President with a safe working majority of his own party in both Houses of Congress.

To elect Mr. Truman will not reunite the Democrats even if they obtained a nominal majority in both Houses of Congress. With his own party divided, he has no chance whatever of getting enough Republican support to achieve a working majority for his measures.

Another Truman administration would therefore, be hopelessly ineffective. To elect it would mean that the country was condemned to enter the critical period of the postwar era with its Government paralyzed and the people divided.

Anti-Poll-Tax Bill—Filibusters

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial entitled "Congress Suffers," from the Miami Daily News, and an editorial entitled "GOP Strategy Points to Only Seven States," from the Tampa Times. Both editorials relate to the anti-poll-tax bill and the filibuster thereon.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Miami (Fla.) Daily News]

CONGRESS SUFFERS

The Senate of the United States stands before the country in a state of self-imposed paralysis. There are 96 Members. The 96 are stalled for the moment by a small minority—about one-fifth the whole. A country which thinks of itself as ruled by the majority sees itself barred from action here by a tiny minority. So much for the working of the Senate rule of unlimited talk.

The occasion for this blockade happens to be the poll-tax bill. It could be any measure to which a substantial minority of the Senators object. The last previous effort to paralyze the Senate in this way was the two-man filibuster against the draft which Henry Wallace's running mate disapproved.

Let us suppose that here, as in European countries, the Communists managed to elect as many as five Senators—in the House are already two Members who follow closely the Communist Party line; this can be said of at least one Senator. Those five Senators could talk so continuously as to veto any action the Senate might wish to take. Suppose a Communist country should attack us as Japan did 7 years ago. Under the present Senate rules these five, as long as their breath held out, could by filibuster veto the legislation essential to our defense. There are Senators who object to Russia's vetoes in the United Nations. How about the minority in the Senate?

The Senate was supposed to have a rule by which two-thirds of the Senators could end debate. That rule, it is found, does not cover a motion to take up a given subject for debate. It proves to be a phony cloture, having no practical effect.

The veto of action by filibuster in the Senate has nothing on the veto in the House by Rules Committee arrogance. The present most atrocious example of that rule by minority is the housing bill which the Senate passed. The fate of the Republican Party at the November election may depend on its action on this pressing issue. The fate of many a Member of the House will depend on action here.

But the little clique of unbending Congressmen, including Speaker MARTIN, opposes any housing act. The bill has been recommended by the committee appointed to pass on the merits of the bill. The Rules Committee, which the little clique controls, has refused its assent to a vote upon the bill. The House is blocked by its Rules Committee as the Senate is by its right of endless talk.

This is a time of emergency in all the world. A people needs, in such time, assurance that their Government, through their legislature, is capable of the prompt, firm action. In this hour we see Congress stymied, paralyzed. And so much the worse for it, by its own consent.

[From the Tampa (Fla.) Times of July 30, 1948]

GOP STRATEGY POINTS TO ONLY SEVEN STATES

Although Senators from four deep South States may not have their hearts in it, they apparently are pledged to go along with those from seven other States in the region in the fight against anti-poll-tax legislation in Congress simply because of the political alinement the Democratic Party has forced upon them.

There are only seven States left which require the payment of poll taxes as a prerequisite for voting. They are Alabama, Arkansas, Mississippi, South Carolina, Virginia, Tennessee, and Texas.

Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, and North Carolina, which complete the 11-State alliance formed to fight the miscalled "civil rights" program, already have seen the light on the poll tax and repealed it. They realized that it not only disfranchises Negroes but hundreds of thousands of whites.

Florida has had better government since it got rid of the poll tax. So has North Carolina. The point is debatable as far as Georgia and Louisiana are concerned. Georgia has the county unit system of electing governors, which is as vicious as the poll tax, and that can defeat the popular will. Louisiana people all can vote—but the least said about it the better.

That the Republican leadership in Congress has chosen to put the poll-tax bill up first in the special session shows its line of thinking. Only the citizens of seven States can be affected, so the bill is the least controversial of the lot President Truman has talked about.

There should be no poll tax in this Nation as a prerequisite for voting. Congress could go ahead and pass this legislation and eliminate it once and for all from the national picture.

But the Republicans, who haven't carried any of the States involved in a long, long time, have worked out the strategy to allow the Senators from those States to take up plenty of time filibustering. That will emphasize the split between the Democrats.

Since the Republicans contend the special session was called only for political reasons, they are throwing political strategy right back at him.

Immigration Fiasco

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL A. REED

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I have always been in favor of our restricted immigration laws as an American policy of security. Never have I objected to the immigrants from other countries where they have been carefully screened to make sure that they are not of a subversive type. If we want to keep our country free we cannot be too careful in our admission qualifications because under our form of government every citizen, whether a native-born or naturalized, is a sovereign in his own right. Our system of government recognizes the citizen as the real ruler. This places a very great responsibility on the National Legislature to see that Communists and other subversive persons are not admitted who do not feel the sacredness of our citizenship and the sanctity of our free form of government and all the responsibilities connected with it.

I am glad to know that the Regular Veterans' Association is fully aware of the danger connected with the loose administration of our immigration policies. It is with satisfaction that I note that when the Regular Veterans' Association was requested to state its position on immigration policy before the Senate Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, Commander Floyd stated the policy of his organization in no uncertain language and in accordance with its national conventions. I take the liberty of expressing Commander Floyd's views before the Senate Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, as follows:

Any soldier who has fought for his country, who has seen his comrades die, who has himself been shot to pieces by the enemy, wants this country of ours safe for Americans. And so does the RVA. For our members are soldiers who have fought the good fight for the perpetuation of decent Americanism.

We are opposed to unlimited immigration and to any relaxation of the immigration laws at present in effect. As a matter of fact, we believe that restrictions should be tightened and the quotas presently authorized should be reduced if anything. It would be preferable to suspend immigration altogether until we can take care of our veterans and other decent citizens who are faced with unemployment and who need proper housing.

The problem of immigration is the problem of assimilation. The only desirable immigrant is, in general, he who promises most rapidly to be absorbed into the great mass of our population and lose his identity as a newcomer. This problem grows greater as our populaiton increases and the actual need for immigration becomes less as a consequence. It is also aggravated by the large percentage of undesirable immigration into this country since 1910.

Eighty years ago, our country could be termed "a melting pot." The country was young; it was building rapidly and wholesome immigrants were needed to help settle the country and carry on the work of development. Immigration was encouraged almost without restriction of any kind. For the most part, the immigrants who poured into America during these early years, and until 1910, were highly desirable, and are substantial today. But the decline came, and since 1910 the great majority of immigrants have been undesirable, high in illiteracy, mentally deficient, and low in ability. We are no longer a melting pot. We don't need nor do we want undesirables from any source to form Red spy rings within the Government itself.

Public opinion sensed that in 1910. And out of that public pressure came the Immigration Act of 1924. This was the signal for the subversive elements, largely of foreign representation, to band together for the purpose of blasting the immigration law out of existence.

The movement now consists of an assembly of highly organized and well financed propaganda minorities with loud voices and oily tongues. They represent the so-called foreign blocs, and foreign funds are a substantial part of their equipment, as shown by the House Committee on Un-American Activities. They are experts at misrepresentation and in the fakery of humanitarian appeals. They are the internationalists, one-worlders, professional pacifists and do-gooders, left-wingers, self-styled liberals, Communists, their fellow travelers, and the bubble-heads and frenzied dupes of all these elements.

It is this same organized and subsidized conspiracy to destroy immigration and undermine the Nation which has fought every bill introduced in Congress to restrict immigration into the United States. They brought about the repeal of the Chinese exclusion laws; they had had an effective part in bringing about the entry of some 600,000 so-called refugees into the country during the war, and outside the quotas; they were instrumental in putting across the un-American Stratton bill for 200,000 so-called displaced persons, and now they are behind a cheap political proposal for the entry of 400,000 additional displaced persons, also outside the quotas. The same crew is endeavoring to place all Asiatics on a quota basis. And all of this conspiracy, whether it be within the ranks of the Federal Government or out of it, is a gross insult on the great unorganized and inarticulate mass of our population, the real Americans who put the safety of the United States and the welfare of their fellow citizens above the interests of foreign nations and alien peoples.

At the present time our immigration quotas permit the permanent entry of 153,929 aliens each year. The Regular Veterans' Association believes that number to be sufficient and that additional immigrants by the hundreds of thousands should not be permitted to enter the United States under any conditions. We are not averse to the entry of displaced persons as such, but we strongly believe and urge that they be carefully screened, that they be charged against the existing quotas, and that no immigration in excess of that authorized by the present laws be permitted to enter the country at any time.

In our opinion, there is no question of humanitarianism involved. The United States owes this particular class of persons nothing as individuals. We are now pouring billions of dollars into Europe to carry forward a dubiously experimental plan, and the so-called displaced persons can be put to better use there than they can here, for we only add them to the top-heavy burdens which our country is already bearing.

If any changes are to be made in the immigration laws as now established, they should be in the direction of further restriction rather than in the direction of the loose and dangerous policies now being used largely by misrepresentation and ignorance accompanied by crocodile tears and ballyhoo.

Mr. Justice Carl V. Weygandt, of the Ohio Supreme Court, has said, "We are partners in the most dangerous type of government yet devised by the mind of men, for in a democracy nothing is self-perpetuating. Democracy has no perpetuity except from the sustaining interest of its citizens." That is worth thinking about. We will do well, and go a long way in perpetuating our country, if we look after our own people, our veterans, and others who are unemployed and who face still greater unemployment, our own who are destitute, underprivileged, and unsheltered because of inadequate housing—and not handicap them and our country further by importing the undesirables of foreign countries.

Hamstringing Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, President Truman charges that the Eightieth Congress is a "do-nothing" Congress, the second worst Congress in history.

That is because Congress has refused to adopt his recommendations, which are unsound, wasteful; would worsen, rather than better, the situation. His tirade is that of an arbitrary, somewhat conceited individual, who thinks he knows more than 531 Senators and Congressmen who represent the people.

All Congressmen and a third of the Senators must, this year, have the support of their people, and it is more than probable that they more accurately represent the people's thinking than does the President. He hopes to be elected by making the home folks believe that the Congress is to blame for the results of the policies which his predecessor adopted and which he is following. He thinks he can fool the people into believing that he can give them everything they want without cost to them.

President Truman is insisting that 531 individuals elected by the people should be the tail on his political kite. When you stop to think of it, is it not astounding that one little man, a former financially unsuccessful haberdasher, elected to the Senate by the corrupt Pendergast political machine, who, prior to his selection for Vice President by President Roosevelt, never distinguished himself, should in so short a time have such a good opinion of himself?

THE PRESIDENT'S FAILURE TO COOPERATE

He asked Congress to cooperate, but he never cooperated—not even with his own party. There is an old saying that "It's an ill bird that fouls its own nest."

When the President criticizes Congress, he lambastes a majority of his own party which has often voted to override his vetoes. Like the marching man who thinks everyone is out of step but himself, or the drunk who charges that everyone but himself is intoxicated, the President considers himself the only possessor of wisdom.

Though the very first words in our Constitution are: "All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress," the President has consistently refused to permit the executive departments to give the Congress information needed to enable it to legislate wisely and adequately.

A few instances show his attitude. He ordered the Justice Department to refuse to make available information which would have disclosed who paid how much, who used what political influence, to "spring" five gangsters, members of the Capone "crime syndicate" of Chicago, out of Federal prisons long before their terms had expired, so that they might be brought to justice. In spite of the obstacles thrown in our way on his orders, three are now in prison and two are on their way back.

The President refused to give information as to how Federal money was spent in the admittedly illegal collection and maintenance of a secret file carrying false charges against prominent citizens, Senators and Congressmen.

He refused repeatedly to give congressional committees information which would have resulted in ousting Communists and enemies of our country from well-paid Federal jobs.

He characterized as "stinking red herrings" Senate and House investigations, which are currently exposing Communists who are not only carrying on their traitorous schemes in this country, but hiding in the shelter of executive departments.

He has refused time and again—and lack of space prohibits the citing of those instances—needed, pertinent information which would enable the Congress to carry out its constitutional duty of legislating.

Is it not more probable that the President, in his egotistical conceit, is responsible for any ills the country may suffer, than it is that a majority of 531 individuals elected by the people are wrong?

Give the Eighty-first Congress a President who will cooperate with them, and at least some of the drones and wasters will be out; the country given a chance to stay out of war—to recover from high prices, a bureaucratic headache.

Let the People Rule

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM LEMKE
OF NORTH DAKOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. LEMKE. Mr. Speaker, Tuesday, November 2, is election day. It is not only our privilege but our duty to vote. As citizens still interested in the best government in the world, save none, it is our duty to see that the members of our families and our neighbors and their families vote. The vote of every member of our family is just as important as our own.

It is also our duty to vote intelligently—to acquaint ourselves with all important issues—and then vote for the candidates who we feel will best serve our States and Nation. There are far-reaching and vital State, national, and international issues involved in this election—issues that directly affect the form of our government—directly affect our own lives and the lives of those who are near and dear to us. Under these conditions, we must not, and cannot afford to fail to vote, and to vote thinkingly and objectively.

There are those who say politics are dirty. May I suggest that politics are no dirtier than we permit them to be. If we tolerate dishonesty and insincerity in Government officials, we have no one to blame but ourselves. If we permit dishonest, clever, gushing politicians to slap us on the back, and then betray us, we ourselves are to blame.

In a Republic like ours, everyone is personally responsible for his own vote. He must not blindly follow false leaders. He must not permit others to do his thinking or his voting for him. Each individual must discharge that duty in the voting booth in accordance with his own best judgment and conscience. He must not be a voting machine for some puny would-be dictator. Whenever the people of our Nation permit others to dictate their vote, then self-government has become a thing of the past.

There always is room for difference of opinion on public issues. You have as much right to differ with me as I have to differ with you, but that difference must be based upon facts and not upon falsehood. No one has a monopoly on human progress. If we allow our own intelligence to guide us, we will ultimately arrive at the desired goal.

We must be tolerant and welcome public discussion pro and con on each and every issue. We must avoid being lopsided, and listen only to one side. There are two sides to most issues. Each of us must be a thinking somebody, and not merely a cog in a blind wheel—a nobody.

I am often told by my friends—and some critical ones—"Well, you are in Congress, and we want you to get this or that for us." Some send telegrams in the forenoon demanding that I balance the budget, and in the afternoon demand that I vote for billions more for gifts to foreign nations. This, when our Government already owes twice as much as the normal value of all our property.

Sometimes that which they ask for is not right—is against the best interest of our State and Nation. At other times it is highly desirable and laudable. However, these friends forget that my State, North Dakota, has just 2 Members as against New York's 45 and Pennsylvania's 33—only 2 out of 435 Members in Congress. Other Midwest States have the same disadvantage. Bearing this in mind, I am sure you will agree with me that North Dakota and the other Midwest States have done pretty well. They have made their weight and influence felt throughout the Nation.

In an election, truth is stranger than fiction. In an election dead and forgotten issues are sometimes resurrected for political expediency. Some of those who resurrect these dead issues are just misinformed and sincerely believe that the corpse is still alive.

A splendid example of this is the attempted resurrection of the MVA—the Murray triumvirate. I cannot believe that those who attempt to resurrect this corpse would do so if they knew the facts, if they knew that it was deader than a doornail, so dead that in the language of the ancient poet Omar Khayyam, "The wild ass stumping its head could not break its slumbers."

It is not for us to tell the voters whether they should be for or against the Murray MVA, but they should know the facts. The truth is that the MVA was buried on December 22, 1944, when President Roosevelt signed the bill authorizing the Missouri River Basin development project. That project is now under construction. Millions have already been spent on it. Why waste our time on dead issues? There are plenty of live issues.

Let those, who hope to be elected by carrying around the corpse of the MVA, tell the voters that under the provisions of the act signed by President Roosevelt, the Army engineers will build the dams on the main stem of the Missouri River. Let them tell the voters that the Army engineers have had over 100 years of experience in building dams—that they built the Fort Peck Dam and many others.

Let them tell the voters that General Pick, in charge of building the Garrison and other dams on the main stem of the Missouri River, built a dam in Burma that is considered one of the world's wonders.

Let them tell the electorate that under this law, the Bureau of Reclamation will build the dams on all the tributaries. Let them tell the people that the Bureau engineers have had 50 years of experience in building dams—that they built such dams as the Hoover (Boulder), Big Thompson, Grand Coulee, Bonneville, and many others.

I cannot believe that anyone who knows the facts and knows the provisions of the existing law would want to put three politicians in charge of building these dams in place of the Army and Bureau engineers. Surely no farmer would take a greenhorn, who never saw a combine or tractor, and tell him to operate them in prefernce to a person who, with his family, has had 50 or 100 years of experience. Truth is stranger than fiction. Let us get the facts, and then the voters—acting as a jury—can draw their own conclusions based upon the facts.

Let these politicians tell the public that after the Army engineers complete these dams, they have nothing further to do with them except to look after repair and maintenance. Let them tell the people that the Bureau of Reclamation, under existing law, will have first claim to the stored water back of all the dams for irrigation, livestock, and other domestic uses. The Army engineers will only get what is left for their 9-foot channel in the lower Missouri.

Let them tell the voters that power plants will be installed, and will be under the absolute control of the Bureau of Reclamation. Under existing law, the plan for North Dakota is to build transmission lines from Fort Peck to Williston, Garrison, Minot, Devils Lake, Grafton, Grand Forks, Fargo, Valley City, Jamestown, Bismarck, Mandan, and Glendive. How can you improve this set-up under an MVA triumvirate of politicians?

Let them also inform the public that when these plants are installed and the transmission lines are completed Federal agencies will have first claim to the electrical energy. This means the REA, which is the principal Federal agency in the Basin States. Let us furnish cheap electricity to the farmers in the Missouri Basin States.

Under this same law, the States have second claim to the hydroelectric energy. They can light up their State institutions, such as schools for the deaf, State universities, agricultural colleges, normal schools, capitols, and penal institutions, and in my State the Bank of North Dakota and the mill and elevator. What more could a political triumvirate give?

Third on the list of priority comes co-ops and nonprofit institutions and plants, and last comes industry, who will get what is left. All this at cost of production and maintenance.

Now that we have this project, why continue to throw monkey wrenches into the machinery? This program is now being carried out just as rapidly as Congress makes appropriations. Congress has already appropriated millions. This project will cost in the neighborhood of $3,000,000,000. It is the largest undertaking of any government. It will add billions of new wealth to the Basin States and the Nation.

This work has been slow in starting because of the war, and since the war, because of the scarcity of material, due to a large extent to our international flirtations. It is up to the people to get the facts, then pass their own judgment—vote their conscience for the best interest of their States and Nation. That is all that anyone has a right to ask of them.

There are other important issues in this campaign, such as burdensome taxes, inflation, the high cost of living, salary increase, and social security. Let us get the truth concerning these issues.

Congress passed a tax-reduction bill. The opponents claim that this bill reduced the taxes for the rich. That is not correct. This law took another 7,000,000 people from the tax roll because of the high cost of living. In addition, it greatly reduced the taxes in the lower brackets, and to a certain extent in the middle brackets.

Every farmer and small-business and professional man and woman with moderate incomes will pay considerably less taxes next year. Surely they are not the rich. The truth is that the taxes were not lowered in the higher brackets. They still remain 85½ percent of the net income. Personally, I would have preferred a different bill, but we must remember that there are 435 Members in Congress, and the majority rules.

We hear a great deal about inflation, but we have inflation. We have had it ever since the war started. High wages, high prices, and the high cost of living are the result and not the cause of inflation. We got inflation when we printed $30,000,000,000 for the cost-plusers and foreign nations, where we never had over $6,000,000,000 before. Our dollar today has only 30 cents purchasing power as compared with the 100-cent dollar in 1937.

That, with high taxes, is largely responsible for the high cost of living. I repeat, the high cost of living is the direct result of our international flirtations, high taxes, and gifts to foreign nations. Using our tax money, the Wall Street internationalists, for a profit, compete with the consumers in the domestic markets and drive the prices up.

The farmer cannot pay high taxes and high prices for the things he uses, and give away his products below cost of production. His dollar too is worth only 30 cents. The laborer and the professional man and woman cannot continue to live on the American standard by getting the same salary and wages as in 1937. Their dollar, too, is worth only 30 cents in purchasing power. Their income must be tripled to break even.

The small-business man cannot pay the high taxes and the increased prices for the goods he buys, and sell to the public at the old price. His dollar too has only 30 cents in purchasing power. Let us put the responsibility and blame where it belongs—on the shoulders of the executive department of our Government, who, under the influence of the international profiteers, are responsible for our cost-plus contracts and our foreign flirtations—inflation.

Again, those in need of social security cannot exist on the present grants. Their dollar, too, is worth only 30 cents. The time has come for a better understanding of these important problems.

There are other false issues. We are asked, "Why did Congress, at the special session, not reduce the high cost of living, and the high cost and shortage of housing?" Some clamor for the return of the OPA—the Russia regimentation—the police state. They forget that if we had continued the OPA, they would be lucky if they had anything to eat or wear at all. They forget how, under the OPA, they on occasion, slipped $2.50 to the black-marketeer to get a pound of steak or butter.

Human memory is short. We all want to fix the other fellow's income—the price of the products that he produces—but not our own. We, however, know that when Mr. Truman's foreign and domestic policy takes 57 cents, on an average, out of every dollar that we earn, on which we pay income tax—when it extracts 125 hidden taxes out of a pair of overalls—that then there can be no reduction in the cost of living or housing.

We know that when the President gives the taxpayers' money to foreign and domestic grafters and inefficient foreign governments, with which to compete with the consumers in our domestic market, that then he is responsible for the high cost of living.

We know that Congress cannot, by passing a law, increase our food supply that the President is depleting by giving it to other nations. It cannot increase it by rationing. We know that if the President really wants to ration anyone, he should ration the foreign grafters and the foreign nations.

In regard to the shortage of housing, the people know that the President built houses for the Italians, for the British, and other nations' peoples. They know that the President shipped needed building material, including lumber, furnace piping, and well casing to other nations. They know that the President's foreign policy is also responsible for the high cost and shortage of housing.

The people know that Congress cannot by law increase the supply of building material that the President is still shipping to foreign nations. The people do not understand why the President prefers to build homes for foreigners rather than for the GI's that won the war others started.

We know that the way to end the housing shortage and the high cost of housing and living is to put an end to this foreign policy. We know that if the President will limit his foreign flirtations to our surpluses and not deplete our necessities, that that is the only remedy. Let the President give to our people the material they create, and stop giving the taxpayers' money to foreigners to compete with our consumers. That will end the high cost of living and the high cost and shortage of housing.

Communism Thrives Under Democrats

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the growth of communism throughout the world began under Franklin D. Roosevelt in 1933. Russia was a second-rate power until it was recognized by him and his party. Before Hitler marched into Poland, Stalin had made a pact with him to divide Poland and the Baltic states. It was the United States that came to the rescue of Russia as it lay prostrate at Stalingrad. There the Soviet had been battered to a new low by Hitler's hordes. It was the United States, under Franklin D. Roosevelt, at Tehran and Yalta, that made an unholy agreement with Stalin for the partition of Poland. There we sank to a new low—a moral debacle—in international skulduggery. When Roosevelt died in 1945 it fell to the lot of the unhappy Mr. Truman to consummate the immoral agreement made by his predecessor. The war was over and with our men, money, and material the United States of America had pulled Red Russia from the pit of oblivion to victorious heights. In fact, it became so arrogant that it could challenge not only its rescuer but the whole world. And all of this under the Democrats of Roosevelt and Truman. This will forever be a sorry page in our history.

And now, Mr. Speaker, our global policy is to contain communism. Abroad we seek to arrest its paralyzing influence. But in the United States both the Roosevelt and Truman administrations have been aiding the abetting Communists and fellow-travelers who have been infiltrating in high Government office. The record is clear on that score.

Mr. Speaker, the President may cry "red herring" about the spy investigation now going on but he cannot deny that he personally has refused congressional committees the right to see pertinent information under his jurisdiction. And the Soviet-teacher's episode of last week lends considerable emphasis to the charges that Mr. Truman is covering-up for the alleged pro-Soviet clique.

The inquiry by a Senate committee into the loyalty of one, Mr. Remington, was effectively blocked by the President. He also blocked the investigation in the Condon case. It may be that these men are innocent of the alleged charges against them and the President by his acts has left the impression that there is merit to the charges.

Mr. Truman will soon have to answer to the voters for the part he and his party have played in advancing the cause of communism throughout the world and in the United States. It will be no defense for him to cry "red herring," when the Reds have established an effective road-block to peace at the expense of the American taxpayer. Roosevelt first and then Truman made this terrible nightmare possible.

On Our Way—But Where?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, during the past 15 years, we have been told that "America is at the forks in the road," "at the crossroads," is confronted with "an emergency," is meeting "a crisis," "has a rendezvous with destiny."

At a ringside seat here in Washington, and with the background, experience, and viewpoint of the average, middle-class, small-town American, who has watched with intense interest the maneuvers of those who have shaped our policy, who are in control of the Federal Government, it is my considered opinion that we are far beyond the "crossroads" and well on our way toward what some call statism—others, dictatorship—either meaning government by a tyrant, loss of liberty and freedom, with its accompanying slavery for the common people.

Some will say, as they did when I pointed to the fallacies of the New Deal, to the increasing power of the Communists in our Federal Government, to approaching inflation and militarism with conscription in peacetime, that I am "seeing things," "finding a bogey man under every bed."

Maybe so. It is better to be unduly frightened, take precautions, prepare for the worst, even though it does not come, than to be caught napping, as we were at Pearl Harbor; to find ourselves confronted by national bankruptcy with a disastrous depression in the offing.

A sense of false security may be not only dangerous but disastrous. It is equally as dangerous, whether it grows out of assurances from leaders who are ignorant, or who, for their own political advantage, lull us into inaction, or lead us on false trails, as it is when overconfidence and failure to act comes from the propaganda of our enemies.

After more than 150 years' adherence to, reliance upon, the principles set forth in our Constitution, through the energy, thrift, and common sense of our people, we became, and are, the richest, most prosperous, and most powerful nation in all the world. We have more of happiness and freedom than any other people.

Notwithstanding that situation, the New Dealers and their powerful propagandists preached the doctrine that the old way was the wrong way; that we had outlived the Constitution; that one-third of our people were ill-housed, ill-clothed, and ill-fed; that everyone could have more, though working less; that hard work and thrift, with self-denial, were unnecessary; that the Federal Government, without cost to the individual, could and would, if they had their way, give everyone what he wanted; that it was our duty to interfere in and direct the internal affairs of every other nation, and, if they thought they needed anything, give it to them.

You know the result of World War II—a host of young men dead, millions disabled, other millions handicapped, entitled to aid; a national debt of almost three hundred billions; prices for necessities—including those for food and clothing—almost beyond the reach of millions.

In addition, conscription of our young men in peacetime; a proposal to strip the States of their National Guard and put them under the control of the Army; worst of all, the regulation of your daily lives by the bureaucrats in Washington; all this and more are the result of a false national policy for which the Eightieth Congress was not responsible.

It would take thousands of words to fully describe the inequities and the consequent harmful results growing out of New Deal policies. Suffice it to say that, if the New Deal continues in power, we will find ourselves completely under the control of a dictator; beneficent he may promise to be, but, in the end, a tyrant.

Think it over, realize where we are and where we are headed.

The next Congress will be Republican; the people should give the country a Republican President who will cooperate so that the two may work together and once more give us a sound, sensible, safe administration in Washington; keep us out of a third world war.

Henry Wallace's Party Tries To Make Oriental Peoples Turn Against America and Is Spurned—Wallace Pro-Russian Policies Will Lead to War and Not Peace

HON. NORRIS POULSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, the platform of the Progressive Party, elucidated and expanded by the acceptance speech of its candidate for President of the United States, Mr. Henry Wallace, contains planks that relate to the oriental countries and peoples, that are intended to make them turn against the United States.

This is a most extraordinary undertaking by a political party composed of American citizens. The American people should know it. A distinguished Filipino lawyer, economist, and writer, Mr. Vicente Villamin, has written an article on the subject for the Manila Bulletin, published in Manila, Philippines.

Candidate Wallace talks about peace with Russia as if he and his followers are the only ones who are for it. In fact, his ideas, if carried out, would likely lead to war instead of peace. In another article, Mr. Villamin discusses this question, drawing a parallel between the present Russian case and the Japanese case before the war.

These two articles are very enlightening and timely. With the continuing international crisis in Berlin, Germany, the American people should have a clear conception of what is going on and its significance. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I make Mr. Villamin's two articles a part of my remarks.

Mr. Villamin's articles follow:

THE PROGRESSIVE PARTY AND THE FAR EAST
(By Vicente Villamin)

The Progressive Party, headed by Mr. Henry Wallace, has a more elaborate platform than either the Republican or the Democratic Party. It includes planks that reveal clearly the party's pro-Russian and anti-American attitude. Those which have reference to the Far East are calculated to create opposition to the United States on the part of the people in that section of the world. That would facilitate Russia's work of proselyting them to communism and converting their countries into Russian satellites.

The far eastern planks are supported either by plain mischievousness or by rank misapprehensions. They are as follows:

1. Calling for legislation to facilitate "naturalization of Filipinos, Koreans, Japanese, Chinese, and other national groups now discriminated against by law."

The act of Congress of July 2, 1946, already gives Filipinos and Hindus the right to become American citizens. The Chinese were given the same right several months before. To make Japanese aliens eligible to American citizenship is too foolish for words. There is a bill in Congress to give the right of naturalization to Koreans. The Progressive Party, therefore, cannot create dissatisfaction against the United States among the orientals on the score of citizenship.

2. Demanding the repeal of the Philippine Trade Act of 1946, which is set forth in a Philippine-American agreement signed at Manila on July 4, 1946.

The repeal of the act-agreement is advocated also by the Daily Worker, the Communist newspaper published in New York. If it is carried out, the greater loser will be the Philippines and not the United States. It will bring down in collapse the program of Philippine reconstruction. In the resultant chaos and confusion, the Communists will function with redoubled zest. There are provisions in the act-agreement that are unfavorable to the Philippines, but most of the provisions are advantageous and helpful. The remedy for the unfavorable ones is not the total abrogation of the act-agreement, for that would be like cutting off the head of a man to cure his headache, but to make representations to the United States, a country that is basically fair and reasonable.

3. Demanding "an end to military and economic intervention in support of reactionary and Fascist regimes in China. * * *" This means enjoining the United States from assisting the recognized government of China and permitting Russia to aid the Chinese Communists to destroy that government and install themselves in its place. American aid to China is chiefly financial, to help her recover from the war's devastations and relieve her people from economic distress. The good people of China will not fail to see that the Progressive Party's attitude is pro-Russian rather than pro-Chinese and that the United States is helping, while Russia is obstructing her rehabilitation.

4. Asserting that "world peace and prosperity cannot be attained unless the peoples of China, Indonesia, Indo-China, Malaya, and other Asiatic lands win their struggle for independence. * * *"

China is already an independent nation. Indonesia is about to gain her complete nationhood. Malaya and Indo-China are on the way in their proper time. The United States has nothing to do with their internal affairs. The Progressive Party is also for noninterference in those affairs. But it is generally known that the Russians are working actively in all the far eastern countries to convince them to overthrow their respective governments and establish communism, and yet there is no disapproval of the Russian activities by the Progressive Party platform or declarations by the party leaders.

5. Supporting "the efforts of the people of Korea to establish national unity and the kind of government they desire." Under the auspices of the United States, southern Korea, where most of the people live, had a free election recently and a national government was set up. Northern Korea, under Russia's domination, refused to take part in the elections and does not recognize that government. The country thus remains divided. Why does not the Progressive Party condemn Russia for the dismemberment of Korea? Why does it insist in unfairly blaming the United States for Russia's fault?

6. Demanding again the "cessation of financial and military aid to the Chiang Kai-shek dictatorship," which is equivalent to saying that the Communist revolutionists, which are supported by Russia, should be left unmolested to seize the national government and run it themselves. That is too plain to mislead anyone.

7. Urging "the policy of Franklin Roosevelt in encouraging the creation of a democratic coalition government in China." This has been tried earnestly and patiently with the help of the United States, but the Communists have rendered it impossible of accomplishment through their unreasonable demands and conduct looking to the domination of the Government by them.

The conclusion is inevitable that the Progressive Party is no intelligent, consistent, and sincere friend of the far eastern countries. It wants democratic America to decamp with her friendship and economic assistance so Russia with her abominable communism could come in freely. The overwhelming majority of the far eastern peoples would say to that party, "Begone and leave us alone; your sympathy we spurn."

WALLACE AND WAR
(By Vicente Villamin)

Mr. Henry Wallace has been nominated as candidate for President of the newly-christened Progressive Party. His election is urged on the paramount issue of "Wallace or war," meaning that his nonelection would mean war, a world war.

It is war with Russia they are thinking about. They admit that there are problems today that may cause war. One of them is the continuing crisis in Berlin. Mr. Wallace has a specific solution for that. It is simple enough. It is for America to leave Berlin bag and baggage. It is assumed that he wants Britain and France to do the same. After they are gone, then Russia would be left free to carry out her plan of making Berlin the capital of a new Germany that will be Russia's spearhead in her march of empire in western Europe and beyond.

Every normal person, not only Mr. Wallace, wants peace with Russia and other nations. What will bring about peace and prevent war is the question. Mr. Wallace believes his solution will do it. But it would not be difficult to prove that he is in error and that his solution would lead to war instead of peace.

There are four major implications in Mr. Wallace's stand on the Berlin situation. First, it is a declaration that America is wrong and Russia is right. Second, it is an exhibition of fear on America's part to assert her rights and discharge her duties. Third, it is a surrender to Russia without justification. And fourth, it is a license to Russia to do anything and everything that her selfish and imperial interests demand.

The first implication is diametrically against the truth. It is America that is right and Russia that is wrong. The joint occupation of Berlin by the former Allies—Russia, America, Britain, and France—is their joint undertaking supported by an agreement. The non-Russian sector of Berlin has more German population than the Russian sector and its administration is the joint commitment of America, Britain, and France. Their abandonment is not only a renunciation of responsibility but is an invitation to communism—the very thing they want to invite out of any country.

The three other implications—fear, surrender, and license—are similar to the ideas that the Japanese militarists got before the last war from a similar American attitude inspired by the same desire to avoid war.

Those ideas led to war instead of peace. Mr. Wallace is advocating today a policy toward Russia that is roughly parallel to that which America followed toward Japan and produced war.

The prewar Japanese case is helpful in understanding the present Russian moves, their motives and methods. Although it was known that the Japanese militarists were preparing for war against America, the American Government went out of its way to be considerate to them—making concessions and talking compromises. This attitude convinced those militarists that America was not determined in the assertion of her rights, that she was afraid to fight for any cause, and that she would pay any price for peace with Japan. That conviction emboldened them to disregard American rights, insult American honor, and put American intelligence in question. From that jumping-off point the attack on Pearl Harbor was an easy decision. That is what appeasement did in the case of Japan—it encouraged her to war.

But what Mr. Wallace proposes with respect to Russia is more than appeasement; it is unconditional surrender by America to Russia. That is not only humiliation, not only cowardice, not only dereliction, but a dissolution of America's moral leadership in the world and her acquiescence to communism and its imposition by Russia on helpless and terrorized countries everywhere. That would be the undoing of the American Nation and the American people will not stand for it. They will fight a war to enforce their will. And they will see to it that it is Russia, not America, that will surrender.

Mr. Wallace's supporters are frankly sympathetic to Russia and antagonistic to their own country in matters pending between them irrespective of their merits. Such a situation is possible only in America, with its conception and misconception of the democratic process. The great service of an enlighted electoral campaign is to show up the unreasoning and the unreasonable people, and the 50,000,000 Americans who could vote are in a position to place men in office, or out of it, or into oblivion. They could squelch Wallace and Wallacism with their votes.

That the Progressive Party is pro-Russian above all was amply proved in the convention. A disturbed delegate proposed a declaration in the platform that while the party condemned the American foreign policy it did not mean a blanket endorsement of any other nation's foreign policy, referring to Russia. The proposal was overwhelmingly and indignantly voted down because it would be admitting that Russia could do no wrong.

Russia will be watching how many votes the new party will get. She will consider every Wallace vote an ally. With allies in America, Russia would get bold and careless about American rights. That would lead to war because America would stand up for her rights.

A Workable Housing Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the special session of the Eightieth Congress has passed a workable housing bill. I have made a brief analysis of it in the hope that it will be of interest to my constituents.

LOW-COST HOUSING

The bill will facilitate the financing of homes in the $5,000 to $6,500 price range. The FHA title I mortgage insurance maximum is increased from $3,000 to $4,500. According to a survey of construction costs by the Bureau of Labor Statistics last year 20 percent of the new housing construction in the country fell within a price range that would be covered by the new mortgage limitation in title I. A new provision is added to mortgage insurance under FHA title II under which 90 to 95 percent loans are permitted up to a mortgage maximum of $6,000. According to the survey above-mentioned 43 percent of new housing construction fell within the authorized mortgage limitation of this provision. Mass production of prefabricated houses will be encouraged by the financial assistance afforded by certain provisions of FHA title VI. Another provision of title VI is designed to encourage on-site mass production of homes of conventional construction.

RENTAL HOUSING

One of the acute problems in the housing emergency is the shortage of rental housing. To stimulate the immediate production of rental-housing accommodations $800,000,000 of title VI FHA mortgage insurance is authorized for such housing construction. A longer term approach to this problem is provided under a $1,000,000,000 yield-insurance program. Rentals charged under the yield-insurance program would be FHA approved and so set that they will meet the needs for dwellings of families of moderate income. Each of these insurance programs are supported by premiums charged so that the amounts involved reflect only contingent liabilities to the Government. Provision is made for the production of rental housing units for families of lower income in localities or metropolitan areas where there is a need for new dwellings at such rental. Projects of nonprofit cooperative ownership housing corporations and nonprofit corporations can likewise be financed in this field under a mortgage which may be insured up to 90 percent, and in case the cooperative is a veterans' cooperative up to 95 percent.

The Red Menace

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, 10 years ago your attention was called to a handbill put out in Detroit by the Communists in support of their candidate. That handbill stated, "There is no God. Religion is a fraud. Priests and ministers are hypocrites." That you do not believe.

The program of the Communist Party calls for the overthrow of our Government by force.

Early in the Roosevelt New Deal administration there were and ever since there have been on the Federal pay roll pinks, Reds, fellow travelers, and Communists.

Years ago, on the House floor and elsewhere, attention was called by me to this Red menace, to the fact that the First Lady was giving support to Communists by appearing with them before the Dies committee, which was exposing them.

My efforts to expose the Reds and the fallacies of the New Deal were rewarded with sneers, abuse, ridicule, vituperation, vilification, and ultimately, with the charge that I was a menace to the country.

With others, I endeavored to oust the left-wingers and Reds from their well-paid jobs in important Government positions. We met with some little success, but, as the press discloses, many remained.

In the last few weeks the House Committee on Un-American Activities, the Senate committee headed by Senator FERGUSON, and our own subcommittee hearings have made it clear that there still are Communist agents in the Truman administration. President Truman charges that these congressional investigations are "red herrings" dragged across the trail to divert the people's attention from his abuse of Congress. He says that these hearings "stink."

But he asked for and received from Congress $6,606,000 to find and oust disloyal Federal employees. He did little or nothing about it. Now he is mad and vindictive because Congress is doing the job he should have done.

Yes, if I may use the President's language, the situation "stinks." But it stinks because, and only because, congressional committees are tipping the lid off the odoriferous mess of disloyalty which has been brewing behind the President's iron curtain.

It is absurd and inconsistent to spend billions of dollars to fight communism abroad as the President asks, as we are doing, while at the same time we give Communists and their agents sanctuary here, as Mr. Truman continues to do and to deny to Congress information which might expose and oust them.

In season and out, on the floor of Congress and elsewhere, ever since I came to Washington, I have consistently, vigorously, and without cessation, fought this Red menace on which, at last, light is being thrown. That I shall continue to do.

The Long-Range Agricultural Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SCOTT W. LUCAS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter received by me from Allan B. Kline, president of the American Federation of Labor.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION,
Chicago, Ill., July 22, 1948.

Hon. SCOTT W. LUCAS,
Senator from Illinois, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR LUCAS: I am writing you this letter to express my appreciation of the fine work which you did in the interests of American agriculture during the past session. You showed real courage in the fight for this long-range farm program.

I am sure, however, that those of you, who worked so hard for it, can take comfort in the fact that it is a good bill, that it was carefully worked out, and that it has due consideration both for the interests of agriculture and for the general welfare.

Very sincerely yours,

A. B. KLINE,
President.

What About the Special Session?

OF
HON. NORRIS POULSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, the special session of Congress which convened on July 26, 1948, was insincerely conceived in politics. The President of the United States, in his role of Democratic nominee for President, announced the call from the platform of the Democratic National Convention in Philadelphia.

While the President's message to Congress in an appeal for votes listed many items for passage, the Nation's attention was directed to two points: High prices and housing.

In discussing these two important issues, we can engage in demagoguery or campaign oratory, or we can be honest and deal with facts, letting the chips fall where they may.

It is easy to say we are for lower prices and more housing, but how do you get them? Let us take each of these important items and analyze the facts. The reason we have high prices is that production does not yet equal demand. Let us not forget that in addition to supplying our own people, we are committed to send huge quantities of merchandise and food overseas. Until Europe gets on her feet sufficiently to contribute in a large measure the supplies and foodstuffs she needs, we can expect her to continue to draw on our own production.

In addition to supplying Europe's needs, the shortsighted policies of the present national administration have contributed to high prices. The roots of inflation are deeply imbedded in the Democratic - controlled Seventy - ninth Congress that preceded us. The President cries out against high prices in one breath, and in the next demands that Congress maintain high prices for farm products and engage in tremendous spending projects that will compete with private enterprise.

But even more significant, as Senator MILTON R. YOUNG pointed out, is the fact that the United States Department of Agriculture deliberately set out about a year ago to reduce the supply of not only pork, but all other meats. The farmers complied with these regulations, and as a result, we are now short of meat and consequently prices have risen. In this same bulletin setting 1948 production goals for farmers, the United States Department of Agriculture asked for the following additional reduction in food supplies. Let me quote just a part of them:

Egg production, 1947 goals, 4,559,000 dozen of eggs; 1948 goal, 4,200,000 dozen. Chickens to be raised, 1947 production, 742,047,000; 1948 goal, 698,104,000. Turkeys, 1947 production, 34,667,000; 1948 goal, 30,507,000—slaughter cattle and calves, 1947 production, 36,000,000; 1948 goal, 32,000,000.

What is this we now read about millions and millions of dollars' worth of potatoes being destroyed? Congress is not to blame for that. It is the Truman administration that is carrying out these policies. Why is the administration recommending that the farmers reduce their wheat crop by 8 percent next year, and the number of breeding cattle by 514,000?

The great majority of newspaper columnists and editors, as well as economists, both Republican and Democratic, have criticized the President's program because in it he asked Congress to cut the cost of living and at the same time asked for legislation which would increase inflation through the expenditure of public moneys.

In 1933 and thereafter we used this method to offset the depression. Obviously to follow that principle now would only increase inflation.

Spending public money, which is always inflationary in effect, did help the country to get out of the depression. No sooner had we climbed out of the depression than we increased public spending still further to finance the war. We also created a huge public debt. In addition to the debt we issued, through high financing, an additional $90,000,000,000 in currency without any additional reserve behind it. These facts I have taken from the testimony of Marriner Eccles on November 25, 1947, before the Joint Committee on the Economic Report. Mr. Eccles has been a member of the Federal Reserve Board for many years. He was demoted by President Truman from the chairmanship of the Board because he did not believe the President's program made economic sense. He is one of the leading financial authorities and economists in the United States.

In his testimony Mr. Eccles stated:

The source of the present inflation is war financing and the enormous Federal deficits incurred in preparation for and prosecution of global war.

He then advocated that this excess money must now be withdrawn from circulation. That is the purpose of the laws which we passed, to change the bank reserve requirements, and so forth. It is a highly complicated and technical procedure.

To illustrate, I will use this simple example:

If your bathtub is running over you do not attempt to build higher sides on it, or a roof over it, to stop the flow—you turn off the water.

In 1920, after the last war, there was a similar inflationary condition to that of today. The Government checked the high prices through the Federal Reserve banks. Mr. Eccles testified that he urged the President to do this several months ago, but he refused.

Further on the subject of inflation, let me quote from a letter Mr. Truman wrote last year to the heads of the executive departments and agencies. This is an official document:

Even those Federal expenditures which are most necessary have the effect of increasing inflationary pressures in the total national economy. We must do everything within our power to reduce inflationary pressures. One of the most effective means of doing this is to reduce Federal expenditures.

* * * It is particularly important that the Federal Government not compete with private demand for items in short supply.

That was President Truman speaking.

Now the President calls for price controls and rationing. On this subject I quote Manchester Boddy, editor of the Los Angeles Daily News, at the time of the convening of this special session:

As Congress reluctantly returns to Washington, there is renewed talk of price-control and rationing of scarce things.

No one, apparently, has the courage to risk a slap from labor by pointing out that such a program, if adopted, must lead to Government fixing of wages, and Government dictation as to where a man may or may not work.

This is elemental. A workingman—quite properly—seeks work that will fetch him the most money.

Who, willingly, would work in a steel mill if a toy factory across the way offered better working conditions and more pay? To insure the production of steel, the Government would have to make it illegal for the worker to leave steel, or make it illegal for the toy shop to offer better pay—or both.

We saw the beginning of that sort of thing during the war. We stomached it then because millions of boys were in the service, with low, fixed pay and no chance to bargain.

As soon as war ended, the public voted overwhelmingly against controls.

Intelligent labor leaders—and there are more of them today than ever before—understand this. But there are still many half-baked little demagogs who tell workers it is possible to fix prices and distribution on one side, and at the same time keep open the opportunity to work where one pleases and for as much as he can.

Admittedly, prices in the United States are maddeningly high.. We are up to our ears in luxuries and necessities that have been priced out of our reach.

But our fundamental picture is sound: Six percent of the earth's people, with three-fourths of its production.

We should not allow agonizingly high prices to make us so sorry for ourselves that we voluntarily become the kept slaves of a totalitarian state.

As an editorial in the Los Angeles Times stated:

When Franklin Roosevelt was creating the wartime OPA, Bernard M. Baruch was asked for his advice, and he submitted a five-point program. Controls had to cover food, wages, rents, profits (through taxes), and Government spending. Unless all five of these things were controlled together, said Mr. Baruch, none of them would work.

But the administration was committed to labor and to the farmers. As a result OPA never fully worked. It gave some appearance of working before war's end, partly because most Americans were patriotic and partly because the Government paid out tremendous subsidies to food producers. The American who bought food at OPA prices paid an additional charge for it in taxes—or will pay the charge when we get around to reducing the national debt.

When the war ended the patriotic incentive for abiding by controls disappeared. Black markets became rife; the big unions fomented a wave of strikes. President Truman said to Congress on November 9, 1946: "The general control over prices and wages is justifiable only so long as it is an effective instrument against inflation. * * * Accordingly, I have directed the immediate abandonment of all control over wages and salaries and all control over prices except that necessary to implement the rationing and allocation programs of sugar and rice. Rent control, however, must and will be continued."

Not quite 2 years later, Mr. Truman called Congress back into special session to give him the same kind of control program he had denounced—the program that wouldn't work because it didn't go all the way, the program that made political exceptions.

The answer to high prices is more production, and still more production, coupled with a return to sincere moral fairness by everyone. Too many people today are determined to "get theirs," irrespective of the other fellow.

Congress during the special session took a sensible forward step to control inflation by curbing excess credit. It refused to pass laws that would curb production and drive supplies into the black market.

Now, let us look at housing. A truthful appraisal will disclose that the housing shortage is not as critical as it was several years ago. The reason is that construction of homes has increased tremendously. The problem has not yet been solved. More homes and rental units are needed. The only way to get them is to build and build and build. Laws do not build houses.

I signed the petition to place the Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill before the House, because I believe that slum clearance should be acted on, and low-cost housing furnished to replace the blights on our cities. But let us be realistic. Every public housing project that the Federal Government builds takes just that much plaster, lumber, plumbing, roofing, and all the other materials that go into constructing a home away from private construction. The people of my district do not want to live in public-housing projects. They want low-cost homes and low-cost-rental units. The Government should not compete with private building for the very materials needed to solve our housing problem in this critical period. This Congress passed laws to encourage and stimulate low-cost building, but here again the answer to the housing shortage is not Government competition but more and more production.

Let us not forget that we have gone through a terrible and disastrous war. We cannot expect all the ills that travel in the wake of horrible holocaust to be cured overnight. It will take time to recuperate and regain our full strength. But with faith, courage, and hard unselfish effort, we can emerge into a brighter day of happiness and security for all our people.

The Formulation and Planning of the New 70-Group Air Force, Under Secretary W. Stuart Symington, Will Not Alone Insure to America the Future Supremacy of the Air, but the Application of the Principles of Sound Business Management to Government Operation and Expenditures Already Constitutes a Procurement Record Unsurpassed in Government

OF

HON. LEO E. ALLEN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, many years ago in a discussion with respect to the pitfalls that long beset Government in business, a learned political economist pointed out a fact that I have long remembered. He stated that three concerns, the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., and the United States Steel Co., probably represented the highest type of efficient, economical, and successful application of sound business administration to private business then existent in the world.

That disinterested and studied finding by a profound student and thinker has intrigued many throughout the years.

It has frequently impinged itself upon my mind, when called to give rules on bills involving the expenditure of billions of dollars of public funds.

I recalled that statement quite recently when this body was debating the authorization of the 70-group air plan enacted in behalf of the Department of the United States Air Force.

That bill contemplated the appropriation in the excess of $2,000,000,000—a peacetime appropriation made to secure our national defense.

During my long years of service in this House—and on many occasions—I have been highly critical of the maladministration by which appropriations made by this Congress have been poured down the ratholes of extravagance and waste by slipshod business management exercised by public administrators in the executive departments.

Mr. Speaker, when the 70-group air force bill was before this House, I was not unmindful of the splendid work that was being done by those charged with administration of the United States Air Force in its every branch of operation.

We, here on this Hill, have long inherently felt that the administration of the newly established Air Army of our national defense was quickly setting a pattern for the highest type of sound business principles and management to governmental administration.

There has just now come to my notice an address made by the Honorable W. Stuart Symington, Secretary of the Air Force.

That address was made to the board of directors of the American Aircraft Industry Association. I wish that I had a copy of that statement the day that the 70-group air force bill was before us here on this floor. Never before have I seen in ink on paper such evidence of righteousness, decency, and a high sense of responsibility to the tax-paying public as was presented by this top-flight Government official.

Mr. Speaker, now hear me well on this: This was not a speech that was ghost written and handed to Stuart Symington for delivery before a mutual admiration society made up of governmental officials, and "Army brass" meeting with a group of contractors and other beneficiaries of congressional appropriations.

It was a straight-from-the-shoulder talk. It was given by one of America's young, recognized, tried, and proved business executives, now a top-flight official of the Federal Government.

It was given in the discharge of his duties and in recognition of the tremendous responsibility which he owes to the American taxpayer.

With great forthright courage he put all the cards on the table and told those with whom his department was going to do business, just what he expected from them in return for the taxpayer's dollar.

I want each and every one of my colleagues to know more of this man Symington. I want them to know him as a man, who, in the discharge of his duties, is bold enough to invoke every means at his command to increase efficiency and effect real economy in every last phase of his executive capacity.

I want you gentlemen on both sides of the aisle to know that here is a man who dares to tell the Howard Hugheses of the aircraft industry, "Cut out all provision of funds for the entertainment of anyone associated with the air arm of the National Defense Establishment. The Air Force is now paying too much for its airplanes. So far as we know there has not been a single production development that has reduced the cost of airplanes since VJ-day."

Mr. Speaker, that is understandable language. It is not double talk, because Stuart Symington uses no double talk. He boldly advised his audience that the FBI and the Department of Justice "would not be called in after the United States Treasury had been pilfered by unconscionable Army contractors."

He told them that he had put both of them on the job already. That both departments are now on the job and that they will be on the job at the very time that contracts are signed, and, furthermore, that both of these agencies now constitute a line operating member of the Department of the United States Air Force.

He went on to advise the aircraft builders that the procurement picture with the funds recently placed at his disposal by the Congress would include a man never connected with and entirely divorced from the aircraft industry, the former president of Sears, Roebuck & Co., one of the most outstanding of experienced buyers ever to enter the Federal Government service.

That straightforward, frank, and candid statement to an assembly of all the aircraft builders in the United States made by Stuart Symington, Secretary of the Department of Air, wholly pictorialized the spirit of the United States Army Air Forces today.

That newly created branch of our national defense is already in being. It is a virile, hard-working, hard-hitting branch of our armed services.

It is altogether headed up by young men highly experienced, battle-trained, and seasoned veterans. They are men skilled in every detail of procurement, management, and operation. Established as an independent arm of our armed services, a bare 11 months ago, it is already regarded by our citizenship everywhere as the most important arm of our national defense and security.

Mr. Speaker, in order that my colleagues may be able to read this memorable address, I am inserting in the RECORD, and including as part of my remarks, the speech made by W. Stuart Symington, Secretary, Department of the Air Force, before the board of directors of the aircraft industry which is as follows:

Before presenting how the Air Force feels about the aircraft industry, and how you all can assist us in our mutual problems, may we refer to some of those problems we in turn have worked on to improve our own position.

First, every effort has been made to have the best men, the most experienced men, in the right logistic positions. We believe our organization is now welded together; but want it to improve steadily.

Secondly, everything possible has been done to prevent the mishandling of funds. An experienced agent of the Federal Bureau of Investigation is now a member of the line operating organization of the Air Force; which procedure, so far as we know, is unique in the military history of this country.

This step is designed to prevent any future occurrence comparable to a recent incident. The basic reason for that latter occurrence is the fact an officer obtained control of his own inspection. That cannot happen in the future.

At the time of this sad occurrence, we testified that we were as sure no other general officer was involved in this situation as we were the sun was coming up the next day; and are glad to report to you tonight that, after most thorough investigation, such turned out to be the case.

Such occurrences, plus the large amount of money now being allotted the Air Force, all point up the extreme care necessary in handling procurement relationships between Air Force suppliers and Air Force personnel.

With that in mind, it is recommended that when any aircraft company, or aircraft accessory corporation, employs any former member of the military establishment, such employment be handled on the condition that said former member does not act as a sales representative; in other words, he not be put in a position where he is attempting to sell or negotiate with his former friends in the Air Force. The dangers here from the standpoint of possible Government or/and public reaction are only too obvious.

And again, the old question of entertainment. We urge that no entertainment funds be approved by the airplane companies for former members of the Air Force to entertain their friends in the Air Force.

With the critical approach to the future expenditure of these billions of dollars, consistent mutual appearances in bars, night clubs, restaurants, etc., cannot but have a negative effect on those who are anxious to criticize.

Because of resistance to this program in many quarters, and the natural resentment of the taxpayer to the cost of the military appropriations, no Government funds will ever be spent with closer scrutiny than that which will be given the expense of the 70-group program.

Organization and streamlining of the procurement picture of the Air Force now includes the addition, as Under Secretary, of one of the most experienced buyers ever to enter Government, Arthur Barrows, former president of Sears, Roebuck & Co.; and also the putting in charge at Wright Field of perhaps the best administrator developed by the War Department during the war years, Gen. Joseph T. McNarney.

It is a fact that in apparent effort to promote a new form of warfare, some people have adopted a policy of constant criticism of Air Force planes, especially bombers, over a period of months. In effect, this has been a tonic to the Air Force. We have faced, and will face, and continue to knock out, any basis for any such criticism. We are stripped down, clean, and ready to go.

In the National Defense Supplementary Appropriations Act for the fiscal year 1948, the Congress has made $2,045,000,000 available to the United States Air Force for the purchase of new aircraft and equipment; and for the improvement and expansion of both public plants and Government-owned facilities in private plants.

In presenting to the Finletter commission, the Brewster committee, and then to the Congress, the great need for this money, money to both build that Air Force necessary for our security and keep the aircraft industry healthy, the Air Force has done what its conscience dictated was the right policy for the future of these United States.

From this point forward, it is fair to say the aircraft industry also has the ball. Beginning now, aircraft and equipment must be produced more rapidly, more efficiently, and in much greater quantity, than at any time since VJ-day.

During the fiscal year 1949, beginning next July 1st, 1,458 new aircraft must be delivered to the Air Force as the first step in a procurement expansion program designed to level off at 5,200 aircraft annually by the fiscal year 1953.

For the first time the aircraft industry now has the go-ahead on a 5-year procurement schedule, a schedule upon which long-range production plans and techniques can be based, to the great benefit of proper production scheduling, and therefore better management, and better value.

This 5-year production program is a challenge to the industry. Its capacity for meeting challenges was amply demonstrated in World War II.

Since VJ-day, however, the same companies which performed this wartime production miracle, companies working with the same type facilities have been unable to meet even the vastly reduced delivery schedules of the peacetime Air Force.

As example, the first experimental model of a certain new fighter scheduled for delivery in August 1945 did not actually make its appearance until October 1946. Deliveries on this contract are to a point which should have been reached in November 1947.

Another example: The first of a new bomber type, which should have made its appearance in July 1946, was not delivered until October 1947; and present delivery should have been reached in December 1946.

All of us know that the responsibility for these delays does not rest solely with industry. The industry and ourselves together have been guilty of setting up over-optimistic delivery schedules. The fact the Air Force has only been able to make commitments on a year-to-year basis, has severely handicapped producers. The necessity for shifting to high-speed jet aircraft has created many unforeseen problems.

Production has had to follow too closely upon the heels of development. Some critical materials have been short. GFE has been short. There have been complicated personnel difficulties.

But excuses and justifications won't give the answers; and I know you all agree we must work together to solve the problems.

The American aircraft industry cannot afford to rest any longer on the laurels it justifiably won for its wartime production effort. It must "get up and get on high blower," and this must be done now.

One year from today will be a day of reckoning. The appropriations just received are but the beginning of a 5-year procurement plan. That plan requires the prompt delivery of 1,458 previously ordered airplanes during the fiscal year 1949. If 1,458 airplanes are not delivered during that year, the Government, all branches, and with good reason, will want to know the reason why.

If we fail to meet these production schedules, we will jeopardize the entire 5-year program.

Putting it another way, when an individual manufacturer falls down on a delivery schedule, he is jeopardizing the future of his entire industry.

The Air Force today is paying too much for its airplanes. Performance is up, yes, but production costs are up, too; and in our opinion, in some cases, the latter are out of proportion to the performance improvements that have been made, even when giving consideration to the inflationary spiral, higher labor costs, and other such factors.

So far as we know, not one positive production development tending to reduce costs has been introduced by the American aircraft industry since VJ-day.

Actually, in some instances, inefficient practices, and resistance to already-proven ideas, has increased.

For example, more tin is cut today by hand shears than during the war.

Second example, before the end of the war, the British developed an optical method for setting up and inspecting tooling, a method using a device known as a "telescope collimator." Air Force technicians obtained data concerning this technique in order to improve production efficiency over here. It had been used in England, with great success. It has taken 2 years, however, to sell this process to our industry; and it will be another full year before the idea can be put to efficient use. One major aircraft company is still resisting adoption of the new method.

In general, there is too small a degree of subassembly break-down in the manufacture of standard-model military aircraft, and although it is true that a high degree of subassembly break-down increases unit costs when aircraft are being produced in limited quantities, in the long run this technique greatly decreases tooling costs.

Now that we are working on a 5-year schedule, there will be no longer any excuse for not introducing economical quantity production techniques as soon as possible. Actually, even in the lean years since VJ-day, some companies have found it possible to set up much more economical quantity production systems than have others.

For example: One company is now manufacturing its major subassembly wing sections in 25-foot pieces, produced in panels, with simple picture-frame type jigs that one man can operate with ease. Other companies are manufacturing these wing sections in pieces as long as 80 feet. Although in general a high degree of subassembly breakdown adds more weight to the airplanes, this extra weight can be virtually eliminated through intelligent designing.

Up until now this particular company's technique has not been any more efficient than other production methods, but we are rapidly approaching the point in our procurement schedule where it will be; and, in addition, the company in question will be able to rapidly accelerate for the 5-year levels with very little retooling or redesigning.

We propose to do everything we can to help industry set up for quantity production. For example, a large amount in the new appropriation is being designated for the tooling.

In making funds available, however, the Air Force is making its main contribution. Industry must take it from there out.

During the war, the American aircraft industry operated well together, this although on a competitive basis. It was given a big job to do, and it did that job in magnificent fashion.

If one company had the designs and another the facilities, the business was spread. The important thing was that facilities were used; and delivery schedules were met.

Since the end of the war, however, it is our opinion that at times manufacturers are thinking of themselves first and the overall picture second. I don't want to wave the flag, but I do want to point out that the American people have now put their faith in air power. They have given us this money to expend; and for that money they want the kind of Air Force believed necessary to protect national security.

Our job now is to give it to them. That should come first. And to handle it right, in our opinion, industry must get back to the family idea. That is the way we can get maximum return on the tax dollar.

Witnesses from industry who testified before the Finletter Commission agreed to subcontract business that could be more efficiently handled elsewhere.

In regard to designs, the aircraft industry today is divided into two groups—the have's and have-not's. The facilities belonging to the have-not's must be put to work on the designs belonging to the have's. The Air Force must go all out with industry in our joint effort to accomplish this aim.

As example, one company has the most practical design for the Air Force's new combined primary-basic trainer. But it would be inefficient and uneconomical for this company to do all the work on the production of this aircraft.

In testimony before the Finletter Commission, that very company agreed to subcontract a majority of the work to another company, provided they could name the subcontractor.

The Air Force, together with the Army, the Navy, the Munitions Board, and other Federal agencies has gone to great effort to make plans concerning the most desirable location of contractors' plants, from the standpoint of economy, and for national security.

In making these plans the military agencies have necessarily placed the national good above the interests of individual contractors. Yet some companies are resisting the implementation of these plans. In attempting to obtain sites of their own choosing, in our opinion, they are placing their own interests above those of the aircraft industry as a whole, and above those of the Nation.

When the Air Force throws some business on top of the aircraft industry pyramid, it cannot be expected to monitor that business all the way down to the smallest equipment subcontractor.

Since the end of the war, a lot of production delays have been due to the unwillingness of vendors, suppliers, and parts manufacturers to accept military business. This is partly because commercial business may be comparatively more attractive in regard to profits, but it is also because long-term commitments have not been possible in the military field.

Now we can make those long-term commitments. The Air Force can make them directly with its contractors, but it is up to the major aircraft companies to follow through with the subcontractors with whom they deal directly. Information about the plans and procurement needs of the 5-year program must be disseminated among all vendors, suppliers, and parts producers connected—however remotely—with the aircraft industry.

We must rely on our contractors to see that this information gets passed along, so that plans can be made and long-term commitments arranged.

If certain manufacturers won't take security business because of profits in other lines, however, let us know. They might not welcome some publicity to that end in these troubled times.

The Air Force is out to get a dollar's worth of air power out of each tax dollar it has been given to spend; and we expect industry to also become preoccupied with the idea of efficiency and economy.

We want to restore the health of the aircraft industry, but do not propose to nourish indefinitely inefficient producers, or to allow military money to go for bailing manufacturers out of their failure in the commercial field.

We must price future production with care. Washing out the difference between a fair profit and abnormal profit on security items, through renegotiation, is no answer to the lack of fair and careful pricing at the outset. Every dollar recovered under renegotiation is looked upon by the public—unaware of our mutual problems—as the result of an effort to gouge the Government. That, of course, is ridiculous, but that is often the way it is presented.

Industry must assist in stabilizing economic conditions within the country, and must try very hard to conduct its business in a free economy, without requesting from the Government the benefit of priorities; and the expediting of materials must remain with the manufacturers.

It is actually in industry's own interest to operate as much as possible on its own, for you and I both know that, while Government is often glad to lend its assistance when needed, the more the Government gets into the production picture the greater its tendency to take over the private operation of your plant.

Industrial personnel plans must make every effort to insure that there will be no manpower bottlenecks to handicap the security program.

In summary, beginning now, both industry and the Air Force have to make each dollar count; and we have to start hitting our delivery schedules right on the nose.

I did not come down here to give any lecture. It is a mutual problem, and these are the facts as we see them.

So let's work it out together in order that we can go before the Congress next year to present not only a record of which we are proud but also a record which will give that confidence necessary to continue the accelerating 70-group production program.

Decrease in Farm Population Contributes to Housing Shortage in Cities and Towns

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WAT ARNOLD

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Speaker, recent years have shown that the farm population in this country has greatly diminished, contributing in large measure to the housing shortage in cities and towns. It has long been my conviction that two of the most important things to be accomplished if the coming generation is to be kept from leaving our farms for the cities, and to follow agriculture, are improved roads and rural electrification. For this reason, I have and will continue to strive for the enactment of measures in support of these aids to the farmers.

The record of the Eightieth Congress in providing funds for REA is an interesting one. I am going to review that record briefly because at different times, propaganda has been circulated to the effect that persons wanting electricity, and who had been signed up for it, were unable to have it because Congress had not provided the necessary money.

The following information will show the progress made in supplying rural electrification to farmers in Missouri from December 1934 to December 1947:

	Number of farms	Number receiving electric service
Jan. 1, 1935	278,454	17,893
Apr. 1, 1940	256,100	39,204
Jan. 1, 1945	243,276
June 30, 1945		72,850
June 30, 1946		93,650
June 30, 1947		119,491
Dec. 31, 1947		128,700

WHAT THE EIGHTIETH CONGRESS PROVIDED FOR REA

Last year, fiscal year 1948, Congress provided the REA with loan funds in the sum of $400,000,000. This was done by an initial appropriation of $225,000,000, which, added to $325,000,000 left over and unexpended from the year before, meant that REA began the fiscal year—July 1, 1947, with $550,000,000 of loan funds available for use during the succeeding 12 months. Later in the year as material became more abundant, an additional $175,000,000 was provided, making available for use in the fiscal year 1948, a grand total of $725,000,000. Incidentally, this was the total amount requested by the REA.

In addition, there was appropriated for administration the sum of $5,225,000 for the fiscal year 1948, and $5,450,000 for the fiscal year 1949. Although the Washington REA office claimed this was not enough, we all know that most of the cooperatives are well on their way administratively, and they no longer need nor desire intensive supervision from Washington.

This year, fiscal year 1949, the House appropriated REA loan funds in the sum of $400,000,000. The Washington REA office requested of the Bureau of the Budget $325,000,000. The Bureau reduced the request to $300,000,000, which was the amount recommended in the official budget, submitted to the Congress by the President. To this, the Congress added $100,000,000. Some may ask, and it is proper for them to do so, why this huge sum was appropriated in view of the already unprecedented backlog of unused funds. I joined with many of my colleagues in the House in urging the members of the Appropriations Committee to adopt this policy. It is justified upon the theory that unless the co-op has a loan contract with the Washington office of REA definitely earmarking a particular sum to a particular project it cannot place orders for material with firms producing such material. Recognizing the importance of rural electrification to our farmers, their need for labor-saving devices for themselves and their families, and their right to some of the comforts of living too, I was one of the Members of Congress to express the hope that no one will be without electricity if and when the necessary materials are available for more rapid construction. By this appropriation the Congress has expressed its belief that the materials situation will improve from now on. Moreover, these REA appropriations are not down the drain. The funds are loaned to the locally owned and locally managed co-ops, and repayment, with interest, is made to the United States Treasury. The repayment record is good. Reviewing the record on repayments, I was pleased to find that no co-op in Missouri is shown to be in default or delinquent in payments of either principal or interest.

While we have doubtless provided it with more money than REA will be able to spend or perhaps allocate in full, to the local cooperatives, it is my feeling that unless the money is available for allocation, orders cannot even be placed for future delivery of materials now in short supply.

The action we have taken will not provide electricity for every farmer as soon as he wants it. It will not provide it for all who have long been subscribers. I wish it could. The job is too big for that. Much will depend upon where the farmers are, who are not yet served. Much will depend upon the decisions of the management of the respective co-ops, and upon their ability and diligence in finding materials and labor for the execution of their plans. Moreover, all plans must be approved by the Washington REA office, and much will depend upon the plans each local co-op submits, as to whether they will receive approval, and in this proper timing of the application for the loan as well as the skill employed in its preparation, may count for something.

The Congress can only provide the money for the loans. The rest is up to REA. Where the lines are built and when is not the business of Congress but of these locally owned and managed business enterprises, subject, of course, to planning which will meet the approval of the Administrator of REA.

MATERIALS IN SHORT SUPPLY AND WHY

The Washington office of REA as well as the managers of the local electric co-ops have repeatedly stated that materials are in short supply. This we know to be the fact. As of March 8, 1948, REA had on hand almost $400,000,000 allocated—that is, earmarked—for certain projects, but not used, and in addition it had approximately $62,000,000 which had not been loaned or allocated. It was shortage of material that contributed chiefly to this backlog of allocated but unused money. This short supply of material may continue so long as the executive branch of our Government insists upon exporting it to foreign countries.

Reports of the Department of Commerce, which licenses all exporters, indicate that wire, generators, magnetos, batteries, boxes, insulation, metal conduits, transformers, sockets, fuses, lighting fixtures, and parts of all kinds have been and are being exported to all parts of the world, and some of it to Communist Russia. There are some of us in the Congress who protest against the exportation of the things which our own constituents and our own people need here at home, and some of us will continue to protest until such time as our own people are provided for.

In the meantime, it is sufficient to point to the record of the Congress to find that the people's elected representatives, at least a substantial portion of them, are stanch supporters of REA. And the Eightieth Congress has the best record of all in this regard. In 2 years the Eightieth Congress voted $800,000,000 of loan funds for REA, 42 percent of the total amount voted in 15 years of REA's history. Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have had a part in providing this loan fund for the extension of the REA program. It is my hope that every farmer in my district, and every farmer in the Nation for that matter, may have the advantage of adequate electric power at the earliest possible moment, and I shall at all times support legislation which appears to be helpful to accomplish this.

Because it may be interesting to compare the record of the Eightieth Congress with the record of previous Congresses in providing REA loan funds, the following is a record of funds voted each year since the beginning of the program:

REA funds voted by Congress

Fiscal year:
1937	46,500,000

Anti-Inflation Bill

OF
HON. EARL C. MICHENER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, this special session of Congress was conceived in partisan politics. It convened in a supercharged politically partisan atmosphere. It was forced by the President to function in the dawn of a bitter campaign.

The President in his message to the Congress outlined an 8-point program for dealing with inflation which embodied in brief the following:

First. Reestablishment of a corporate excess-profits tax.

Second. Restoration of controls over consumer credit.

Third. Greater authority to the Federal Reserve Board to regulate bank credit.

Fourth. More regulative powers over speculation on the commodity exchanges.

Fifth. Allocation and inventory control of scarce essential commodities.

Sixth. Tightening of rent controls.

Seventh. Authority to reintroduce rationing of scarce essential commodities, if necessary.

Eighth. Restoration of price controls in case of key commodities affecting industrial production or the cost of living.

Mr. Speaker, in substance the bill before us gives the President the legislation asked for in points 2, 3, and 4 of his message. It does not include the imposition of a new corporate excess-profits tax, and it does not give the President a blank check to reinvoke allocations, priorities, and rationing as provided during the war and as administered by the OPA.

Hearings were held on the President's requests by the Banking and Currency Committees of the House and the Senate. These are the committees having jurisdiction over these subjects as provided in the Congressional Reorganization Act.

Everybody knows that prices are too high, and that the country in is the midst of very serious inflation. Every sensible person wants to do something about it. Like sin, high prices are with us and, like sin, conditions cannot be remedied by the simple process of Congress passing a law proclaiming that high prices are at an end, and that the President is authorized to make the pronouncement.

Inflation is a disease brought about by causes. Temporary expedients may give temporary relief, as was the case during the war. Wartime opiates, controls, and regulations had their place as emergency necessities; however, the fighting war is over and we must now think of a sound future economy for our country in peacetime. We cannot continue to borrow, to spend, and to lend without giving consideration to the pay day. There is a limit to our capacity. The time when we should begin to worry about our future stability has long since passed. Our real problem is to get back on a peacetime economy with as little inconvenience, dislocation, and suffering as possible. We cannot have our cake and eat it too. Sacrifices on the part of all of us are ahead before we get out of the financial woods. In the process we must not only see the trees, but we must see the forest.

Loose talk is cheap; demagoguery is cheaper. High prices and inflation can only be checked by getting at the root of the evil. I voted for price regulation in war years. In the beginning it was my view that selective price controls could not long endure and production continue. I wanted to freeze all prices, profits, wages, services, and commissions at a date preceding the enactment of the first control law. With the support prices and benefits already provided by the Government to those groups operating at a disadvantage, the relationship between industry, agriculture, and all the rest was in a fair ratio. I do not like to rehash but I am still convinced that if this policy, which was advocated by Bernard Baruch and many other patriotic businessmen and economists, had been followed, we would not be suffering this scourge of inflation today. That is water gone over the dam, and we cannot win tomorrow if we spend today quarreling with yesterday.

I could talk for a long time about administration mistakes, largely responsible for bringing about present conditions. The people, however, who must pay these high prices are not so much interested in who is to blame as they are in what we can do to help conditions now.

For years the Government has been spending more than it takes in. The products of our farms and our factories have been consumed in the war. We have not created and saved. We have produced and destroyed. Government costs and expenses have steadily increased and it seems almost impossible for the Government to economize, eliminate waste, and reduce spending. Round after round of postwar wage increases and profits add to inflation. In addition to all this, the aid to Europe and the new rearmament program are certainly inflationary. The time has arrived when this whole matter must be met courageously.

Mr. Speaker, in my opinion the vast majority of our people do not want the Congress to give the President a blank check as demanded by him. One of the principal issues in the 1946 campaign was OPA, the way it had been administered, and the effect it had on the general economy of the country, production, and the daily lives of all our people. To hear the President today, one would think that he had nothing to do with the elimination of OPA and controls. The record tells us that the President, on November 9, 1946, personally ended price controls on everything but sugar, rice, and rent. In his statement directing abandonment of controls, he said:

I am convinced that the time has come when these controls can serve no useful purpose. I am indeed convinced that their further continuance would do the Nation's economy more harm than good.

He also said:

The law of supply and demand operating in the market place will from now on serve the people better than would continued regulations of prices by the Government.

That was what President Truman thought in 1946 when he took the lead in removing price controls. In his address to the special session of Congress on July 27, 1948, he said:

There are still some people who repeat the old argument which was used by those who killed price control 2 years ago. They said that if we would only take controls off, production would increase, prices would go down, and there would be more for everybody at a lower cost.

He concluded:

The record shows unmistakably that this argument was false.

The Democratic administration has made mistakes; President Truman has made mistakes; and the Congress has made mistakes. This name calling and political expedience talking should have no place in our thoughts and our deliberations in this era of high prices. What the country needs, and what it is entitled to, is more honest-to-God cooperation on the part of the President and the Congress, and less incrimination and reincrimination. This problem is too serious. The American people should not be crucified on the altar of political expediency.

In plain vernacular, the Truman politicians will say that this special session is a flop, and that the Republicans are to blame. Well informed people in Washington admit that this bill and the housing bill are sound and will be helpful. Neither bill is a complete solution to these problems. Further consideration and study will be given in January.

I agreed with David Lawrence, the columnist, when he said that instead of a special session there should have been a special commission composed of business, industry, agriculture, labor, and representatives from Congress, charged with the responsibility of making a nonpartisan report to Congress not later than January 1. That sensible suggestion received much consideration here but such a sound approach to so vexing a question would not have served any partisan, political purpose in the coming election. The President's caustic criticism because Congress adjourned until after the election was an afterthought inspired, it would seem, by his waning political fortunes.

Shortly before Congress adjourned in June, Senator BARKLEY, now the Vice Presidential candidate, and then and now Democratic leader in the Senate, urged the adjournment of Congress. Listen to what he said in the Senate:

I have done what I could to cooperate with the majority in bringing about an adjournment, because I think if we sit here until after the convention, or if we sit here between the conventions, or after the two conventions, the entire time of the Congress will be taken up with the political bickering and political legislation and political oratory, and I do not want that to be brought about. I want to finish what we can finish and adjourn the Congress, and I have tried my best to cooperate with the leaders on the other side to bring about an adjournment.

Mr. Speaker, I agree thoroughly with what Senator BARKLEY, with his long legislative experience, believed when he made that statement. That was the general feeling in the Congress regardless of one's political affiliation. Well, the proof of the pudding it in the eating, and Senator BARKLEY's prediction came true in the 2 weeks' preelection session called by the President.

The legislation which we will pass at this session will be wholesome, but it will not be conclusive. Take meat, for instance. Any Presidential or congressional fiat will not produce cattle, hogs, poultry, and sheep. That all takes time and planning. There cannot be meat on the market or in the butcher shops unless it comes from the farms and the ranges, and there cannot be meat on the farms and on the ranges unless there is corn, wheat, and food for the meat animals. The shortage of feed and the price of feed find expression in the price the housewife pays at the butcher shop.

The farmer is not going to produce this meat at a loss. There are 10 percent less cattle in the country today than there were in 1947. The sheep population is at the lowest figure since the Civil War. There are many less hogs than there were a year ago or 2 years ago, and, excluding the springer chickens, the poultry supply is greatly reduced. On the other hand, our population has increased. Our people are eating more meat per capita than at any time in our history. We are helping supply other countries with food. Now, if we are realists, we cannot figure on much cheaper meat until there is more of it, and the same goes for the other food items which are in short supply. The bumper crops of the current year in this country and in Europe will eventually reduce the cost of food, but not immediately. It may be months.

The management of money and credits is so technical that we must necessarily rely upon the experts in that field. Chairman Eccles, of the Federal Reserve Board, has been insisting upon a tightening up of credits for some time. According to the hearings, the President did not agree and, as a result, credit has gone wild. Even though the President and the Federal Reserve Board have had adequate power of control in the past, yet this bill gives additional power and emphasizes the use of this power by the Board.

In 1933 currency in circulation amounted to $5,500,000,000; in 1939, $7,600,000,000. That is before we entered the war. Today it is approximately $27,000,000,000. There is a lot of money floating around the country, and people are trying to spend it. Too often they pay little attention to what they buy or the amount they pay. We have an unheard-of volume of currency, and the velocity with which it is spent seems unthinkable. Everybody apparently has money and is bidding against everybody else for goods and commodities in short supply. This condition must eventually be remedied. Some people are going to get hurt to some degree in the process.

By the cooperation to which I have referred, the operation can be almost painless. Otherwise there is bound to be suffering. It is idle to assume that the country can continue to spend and borrow, work less, produce less, and still have more. To believe that there is nothing that can be done about inflation is the thought of a defeatist. On the other hand, to believe that the country can get out of this mess without sacrifices, without economy, and without reversing some of our present practices is just foolhardy. We must all put our shoulders to the wheel and our minds to the job, and together go forward to the end that we get back on a sound basis of economy.

It is to be hoped that when the Congress returns in January its several committees and the administration will enter upon the task, freed from political incentive and election rancor.

My Record in the Eightieth Congress and Why I Voted Against the Marshall Plan and the Draft

OF

HON. WILLIAM C. COLE

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. COLE of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, for almost 6 years it has been my high privilege and distinguished honor to represent the Third Congressional District of Missouri in this the greatest legislative body in the world. Fully realizing my responsibilities in this high office I have always done my best to ably, fairly, and impartially represent the 300,000 citizens of my congressional district and render to them prompt and efficient service. Every 2 years it is my duty to submit an account of my service as their representative. Therefore, I take this opportunity to outline briefly my voting record in the Eightieth Congress.

I am proud of the accomplishments of this Congress, and with few exceptions the legislation enacted had my support. I shall first enumerate the major accomplishments and then discuss the controversial legislation that I opposed.

FREED COMPETITIVE ENTERPRISE

We freed competitive enterprise by abolishing 76,000 rules, regulations, directives, and orders, thereby releasing the energy and the capacity of our citizens to achieve an all-time high in production and employment.

BALANCED THE FEDERAL BUDGET

For the first time in 16 years our Nation has operated within its income and on June 30, 1948, our Treasury had a surplus of almost $8,500,000,000. This was accomplished by cutting the administration's padded budgets by more than $6,000,000,000, but in so doing the efficient operation of our Government and the welfare of our citizens was not in any way curtailed or lessened.

CUT NATIONAL DEBT

Through the economy of the Eightieth Congress $7,000,000,000 was paid on the national debt.

AGRICULTURE

A long-range agricultural program was adopted for the welfare of both consumers and producers providing price support of basic farm commodities at 90 percent of parity through June 30, 1950, and of nonbasic farm commodities at from 60 to 90 percent of parity through December 31, 1949, except that milk and its products, hogs, chickens, and eggs are supported at 90 percent of parity for that period. Beginning January 1, 1950, the long-range price-support program will go into effect. This includes a general revision of the parity formula to take into consideration the varying costs of agricultural production, changes in the pattern of consumption, and other factors. Parity is a formula approved by Congress to equalize prices for what the farmer sells and prices of things he buys.

RURAL ELECTRIFICATION, SOIL CONSERVATION, AND FLOOD CONTROL

Mr. Speaker, I have always been a stanch supporter of rural electrification, soil conservation, and flood control. Therefore, it is with much personal satisfaction that I report that this Congress authorized $800,000,000 in loans for rural electrification, which is twice as much as has ever been appropriated by any previous Congress. During fiscal year 1948, REA electricity was extended to 400,000 farm homes and an even larger number of farm homes are scheduled to receive electricity during the 1949 fiscal year.

Five hundred million dollars was provided for soil-conservation activities and $262,500,000 was authorized for soil-conservation payments for 1949. Record-breaking appropriations for river and harbor improvements and flood control aggregating $997,563,000 were authorized, and I am pleased to report that I was successful in obtaining the allocation of adequate funds for this purpose in the Third Congressional District of Missouri.

RECORD ROAD-BUILDING PROGRAM

The Eightieth Congress launched the greatest rural road-building program ever undertaken cooperatively by the Federal and State Governments by appropriating $202,000,000—almost twice as much money for Federal participation in secondary road construction as was spent by the Federal Government for that purpose in the 10 years prior to 1948.

CROP INSURANCE

We enacted an entirely new crop insurance act, providing a sound and businesslike program of insurance for a great many agricultural commodities; strengthened the farmers' marketing act; chartered the Commodity Credit Corporation; stabilized the sugar market in the interests of consumers and producers and provided liberally for campaigns against the livestock hoof-and-mouth disease, cattle grub, weeds, insects, and other pests.

WAR VETERANS

The Eightieth Congress provided the most far-reaching and effective system of rehabilitation benefits and aids for war veterans ever placed on the statute books of any nation in the world. The program for the construction of veterans' hospitals has been accelerated, educational opportunities have been expanded, veterans' preference in the civil service has been reinforced, pensions and benefits for the disabled and survivors of those who made the supreme sacrifice have been increased, subsistence allowances for those pursuing full-time educational training have been increased. Ceilings on allowances for on-the-job training have been raised. Terminal-leave bonds were paid off in cash. Aids for veterans housing have been provided. In all more than $15,000,000,000 has been appropriated by this Congress for the welfare of our 18,000,000 war veterans and 188 bills passed to meet their needs.

CARE FOR NEEDY, AGED, AND ILL

We passed over the President's veto a bill increasing payments by $5 per month for the needy, aged, and the blind, and increasing payments by $3 per month for each dependent child, thereby adding $184,000,000 annually to social-security payments received by 3,500,000 needy dependent children, the aged, and the blind.

REDUCED TAXES

Three times President Truman vetoed tax-reduction bills passed by the Eightieth Congress, but the third time we passed it over his veto. Seventy-one percent of the tax relief provided by this bill went to those with incomes under $5,000 and 7,400,000 wage earners in the low-income brackets were removed from the tax roll. Married couples are permitted to divide their income for tax purposes and an additional $600 exemption is allowed for persons over 65 and for the blind.

IMPROVED LABOR-MANAGEMENT RELATIONS

It was also necessary to pass the Taft-Hartley Labor-Management Act over the President's veto. Only 83 of the 435 Members of the House voted against the final passage of this law which provides fair and just procedure for peaceful settlement of labor-management disputes; protects the rights of workers to unionize and control their unions, to bargain collectively, and to strike; restores constitutional rights of employers, and safeguards all the people against widespread work and production stoppage that imperils the national welfare.

This law has reduced strikes and work stoppages by almost 50 percent and reduced the number of man-days of idleness caused by work stoppages by 61 percent. I supported this legislation and voted to override the President's veto of it. This is the law that the Democrats seeking office pledge themselves to repeal.

HOME BUILDING

The Eightieth Congress freed the building industry of stifling rules, regulations, and directives, stimulated construction through Government guaranties of building loans; had Government assume large part of responsibility for veterans' loans, and gave war veterans priority in home building and rental of new homes. In 1946 under New Deal regimentation and confusion only 437,800 dwelling units were completed; in 1947 under free enterprise 835,100 units were completed, and in 1948 a million dwelling units will be built in the biggest building boom of all time.

NATIONAL DEFENSE

We provided adequately for national defense by unifying the armed services and making cash appropriations and contract authorizations totaling $24,128,110,346 with special emphasis on air power; by providing for development of better weapons including guided missiles and atomic bombs; by authorizing $175,000,000 for merchant-marine expansion, and by revising Army justice in an effort to assure completely fair treatment under Army law for officers and enlisted men.

OTHER LEGISLATION

We passed hundreds of other measures that are benefiting every segment of our population and creating wholesome conditions for prosperity and happiness; measures buttressing industry, agriculture, and mining; supplying long-needed banking legislation; strengthening the Federal Reserve banks' operation; reorganizing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and in other ways making for sound national progress.

Mr. Speaker, I supported all the legislation referred to above. Now, let me discuss the controversial legislation I opposed and explain the reason for my opposition.

GREEK-TURKISH AID AND THE MARSHALL PLAN

I was one of the 74 Members of the House who opposed Greek-Turkish aid and the Marshall plan. If I had thought that this legislation would in any way prevent another war, I most assuredly would have voted for it. However, past experience has convinced me that the $17,000,000,000 the Marshall plan will cost could be better spent in building up an armed force second to none, as this is the only action Russia understands. Furthermore, the impact of this program upon our American economy will be so great that our American standards of living will be materially lowered. We can expect to be unable to purchase many of the necessities of life; our farmers will find it almost impossible to procure farm equipment needed to produce the vast amount of crops demanded of them, and will be required to continue their struggles with worn-out farm machinery for which repair parts are not obtainable. By adopting this plan, we run the risk of wrecking our own economy.

The recent war imposed a terrific drain upon our raw material and other resources. Agricultural lands are being overworked, production equipment has deteriorated and needs replacement, and there is still a great backlog of demand among American people for all sorts of manufactured products. Our excess of exports of goods and services has already caused a dangerous price rise and cannot be maintained at the present unprecedented rate. In view of these facts, a deliberate increase of inflationary pressure is unjustifiable. Our country does not possess an inexhaustible supply of resources. It has been estimated that our petroleum supply will last no more than 15 years at the present rate of consumption. Our country cannot hope to fill the world demands for food. Most of the commodities that we are now exporting are in short supply in the United States, and this is causing us considerable hardship that the results thus far obtained do not justify. We should not export steel, fertilizer, trucks, automobiles, tractors, mechanized farm machinery, electrical machinery, and equipment and petroleum until our own demands have been satisfied and we have a surplus sufficient to create a buyer's market here at home. Our efforts should be spent in strengthening our own economy. At the present time the economy of all the rest of the world is geared to ours. As the most important industrial nation in the world it is our responsibility to maintain our own economy on a sound basis. If we fail to do this the economy of most of these other nations may be seriously disrupted or adversely affected. Failure of our domestic economy would undo anything we might accomplish by the Marshall plan. By creating inflation, by reducing our natural resources, by siphoning off our industrial production, by bleeding ourselves white we will become an easy prey for any aggressor nation. We must keep our Nation strong and solvent, because bankruptcy and impoverishment mean discontent which breeds communism.

The Marshall plan is not preventing the spread of communism, but has succeeded only in alarming the U. S. S. R. and causing them to redouble their efforts to gain Communist supporters in Europe. It has made possible the subsidization of socialism. Most of the countries now receiving this aid are abandoning the free-enterprise system and socializing great portions of their economies. For instance, in Britain, prices for the necessities of life are being held to about half what we Americans are required to pay through the payment of Government subsidies totaling one and one-half billion dollars—two-thirds of which is derived from the Marshall plan and comes from the pockets of American taxpayers.

The aid already extended by this plan is one of the major causes of inflation here at home. The only way to cure inflation is to bring supply and demand in balance. There would have been such a balance by now but for the inflationary action resulting from our foreign aid since the war's end. Another reason for my opposition to the Marshall plan is that it deliberately bypassed the United Nations, thus inevitably weakening an organization which is spending its energies seeking a peaceable solution to world problems. Another objection is the form of administration which has been set up. The Economic Cooperation Administration—Marshall plan—is to operate outside the regular civil-service system. This is not a healthy precedent and leads to abuses. There have already been charges of favoritism in filling positions in ECA—a practice which cannot be corrected in view of the lack of control over its administrative actions. Furthermore, I cannot justify sending mechanized farm equipment abroad to till farms of such small acreage that horse- or mule-drawn equipment is more than adequate and is all the natives know how to use. Furnishing this mechanized equipment makes necessary the supplying of fuel and lubricants with which to operate it.

Another feature of this program that I cannot justify is the so-called incentive provisions. How can gifts of 272,000 tons of tobacco, millions of dollars' worth of intoxicating liquors, radios, and recreational equipment each year be justified? Remember this is costing our American taxpayers $6,250,000,000 this year and is keeping prices high. These are just some of the principal reasons why I voted against the Marshall plan. Now that it has been adopted I sincerely hope that my judgment in voting against it was wrong, but as to this only time will tell. It was a conscientious vote based upon thorough study of the proposition, and for what I sincerely believe to be for the best interest of our great Nation.

SELECTIVE SERVICE

Mr. Speaker, I voted against the reinstatement of the draft because I am opposed to compulsory military service in peacetime. History has proven that compulsory military service in peacetime has invariably resulted in war and destruction for the nations who adopted it. France, Italy, Germany, and Japan are examples of this. Compulsion in any form is strictly contrary to our American principles. Our forefathers came to this land of the free to get away from such things in their native country. Furthermore, this drastic action is unnecessary to provide for our national defense. Our military leaders, in an effort to retain their power and prestige, have discouraged voluntary enlistments. Their drive for this program has been long and relentless, starting before VJ-day with their demand for compulsory military training. When we made service in the armed forces more attractive by increasing pay, liberalizing retirement provisions, and reducing the term of enlistment, they raised the physical and mental standards required to qualify and even though 2-year enlistments were authorized by law they refused to accept recruits for this period. The Navy and Marine Corps experienced no difficulty in filling their quota through voluntary means, and it is a well-known fact that the standard requirements for enlistment in either of these branches of the service are much higher than those required by the Army, and yet I know of instances where young men have applied for Army enlistment and upon being rejected applied and were accepted by the Navy or Marine Corps.

I do not believe a single Member of the House would have voted against this proposal had war been imminent and our Nation's security imperiled, but this was not the reason given for the need for this law. The sponsors of this legislation frankly stated that there was no immediate danger of war or any indication of a threat of war in the foreseeable future. They stated that there was no crisis and that this law was needed solely to build our Army to its authorized strength.

This is borne out by the fact that all inductions are to be delayed until after the coming election.

Voluntary recruitment has been deliberately stifled and discouraged by the military authorities in order to make it appear that a peacetime draft is required. The National Guard organizations have been refused adequate equipment and their expansion prevented. Even so, many of these organizations have their full quota and a waiting list of recruits wanting to enlist. Reserve organizations are also being slighted and discouraged by those in high command. I am firmly convinced that the men required to build our Army up to its authorized strength can be obtained through voluntary recruitment.

This, briefly, is my record in the Eightieth Congress and I am proud to submit it to the people of my district for their consideration.

Major Accomplishments of the Eightieth Congress

OF

HON. WAT ARNOLD

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Speaker, this Eightieth Congress has been called a do-nothing Congress and by the President "the worst Congress." In any effort to disparage an opponent, it is human nature to point out his mistakes and the things he has not done, rather than any good he may have done. As a Member of this, the first Republican Congress in 14 years, I feel it my duty to set forth some of the things the Eightieth Congress has accomplished in spite of opposition and lack of cooperation from the executive branch of the Government.

Major accomplishments of the Eightieth Congress include:

First. Competitive enterprise has been freed, and the people liberated from 76,000 rules, regulations, directives, and orders, resulting in an all-time high in employment, production, profits, and wages, and a record $200,000,000,000 annual national income.

Second. The Federal Treasury for the first time in 16 years is out of the red. Fiscal 1948 ended with the biggest Treasury surplus in all history—$8,419,469,843, seven times the previous high established 21 years ago.

Third. Cut the national debt by $7,000,000,000, to fight inflation.

Fourth. Reduced the President's budget by $6,000,000,000, to fight inflation.

Fifth. Cut taxes, despite 3 Presidential vetoes, with 71 percent of relief going to those with incomes under $5,000, and removing 7,400,000 small wage earners from the tax rolls completely, giving extra exemptions also to the married, aged, and blind.

Sixth. Passed over Presidential veto the Taft-Hartley Labor-Management Act providing fair and just procedures for peaceful settlement of labor-management disputes; protecting the rights of workers to unionize and control their unions, to bargain collectively and to strike; restoring constitutional rights of employers, and safeguarding all the people against widespread work and production stoppages that imperil the national welfare.

Seventh. Exposed Communists, Fascists, and other subversives in the Federal Government, in labor unions and in the film industry, and reversed the appeasement policy toward Russia.

Eighth. Aided European recovery and supported a bipartisan foreign policy.

Ninth. Joined International Refugee Organization and gave it $71,073,900 to carry on.

Tenth. Passed 188 bills meeting needs of war veterans, increasing pensions, allowances for student GI's, proportional pay for veterans in on-the-job training, and cashing of GI terminal leave bonds; higher pensions for Spanish-American War veterans, and aids for veterans' housing.

Eleventh. Generated a building boom. Under New Deal controls and subsidies, in 1946, 437,800 houses were built. In 1947, under Republican free enterprise and sound Government aid, 835,100 were completed, and in 1948 over 1,000,000 will be finished.

Twelfth. Congress helped farmers. Adopted long-range agriculture program pledging price support for maximum production of food; provided twice as much money for rural electrification as any previous Congress; appropriated more than $500,000,000 for soil conservation; launched greatest rural road-building program in history; fostered stability of agriculture through a new, workable crop-insurance act; chartered Commodity Credit Corporation, and greatly expanded Government aid in campaigns against livestock foot-and-mouth disease, and crop deterrents, such as weeds, insects, and other pests.

Forwarded reclamation, river and harbor improvements, flood control; made record-breaking appropriations for river and harbor improvements—$285,500,000—and flood control—$712,063,000—all being essential to expansion and protection of our national economy.

EXPANDED SOCIAL SECURITY

Thirteenth. Expanded social security. Passed over Presidential veto a bill increasing payments by $5 a month for the needy aged and the blind, and increasing payments by $3 per month for each dependent child, thereby adding $184,000,000 annually to social-security payments received by 3,500,000 needy dependent children, the aged, and the blind; and exempting from social-security insurance payments newspaper and magazine vendors and other independent contractors over whom no employer exercises direct control, thereby preventing an impairment of the old-age and survivors' insurance trust fund built up by those who had paid taxes over the years.

Established a National Heart Institute within the United States Public Health Service to fight diseases of the heart and circulation, provided $500,000 for the research institute to combat these diseases; provided $28,400,000 for cancer research.

Fourteenth. Provided a cost-of-living pay increase for postal and other Federal employees.

Fifteenth. Congress submitted to the States a constitutional amendment limiting Presidents to two terms.

Sixteenth. Authorized voluntary trade agreements. Empowered the President, upon advice of the Attorney General, to approve voluntary agreements among business firms to ration and channel commodities in short supply to the most essential purposes domestically and to meet foreign commitments.

Extended export controls: Temporarily extended and strengthened the President's authority to control exports in line with United States policy to favor cooperating nations and withhold sinews of war from noncooperating countries.

Seventeenth. Aided small businesses. Created special committees of the Senate and House of Representatives which are seeing that small businesses, the backbone of American industry, get a fair break, especially in the awarding of Government contracts for national defense and aid to foreign nations.

Eighteenth. Extended Reciprocal Trade Act with reasonable safeguards, for 1 year, with amendments requiring the President to report to Congress and the people when, in secretly making a trade agreement with a foreign country, he exceeds recommendations made by the United States Tariff Commission pursuant to standards prescribed by Congress for protection of American industries and agriculture.

Nineteenth. Railroad retirement: Retirement and disability annuities under the Railroad Retirement Act were increased 20 percent—Public Law 744—without any corresponding increase in taxes under the act. The same law reduced the employer contributions under the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act from a flat 3 percent of pay roll to an immediate one-half of 1 percent of pay roll under a sliding-scale formula. The rate will remain at one-half of 1 percent until the reserve fund, now about $900,000,000, falls below $450,000,000 and then will increase gradually, returning to the full 3 percent only when and if the fund falls below $250,000,000.

Twentieth. Railroads, financing: Permission was granted for railroads not in bankruptcy or receivership, under specified conditions and with the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission, to alter or modify their bonds, debentures, or other forms of indebtedness—Public Law 478. In the past, railroads in need of financial reorganization have had to resort to receivership or bankruptcy, often at a great cost. The new arrangement is expected to cost considerably less. Reorganization under the new law requires approval of the holders of at least 75 percent of the railroads' obligations, or a greater percentage, to be determined by the Interstate Commerce Commission, if 75 percent of the obligations are held by fewer than 25 persons. It must have been determined at public hearings that such reorganization is in the best interest of the public, the railroad, its stockholders and holders of the obligations, and is not adverse to the interests of any creditor of the carrier not affected by such modification.

The Republican Congress passed hundreds of other measures that are benefiting individuals and the Nation as a whole. There is much, very much, that remains to be done, and to accomplish this it is essential that there is cooperation between the President and the Congress.

The results of the coming election will determine whether the constructive effort on the part of the Eighteth Congress in its fight for sound and good government is to go forward.

Trend Toward a Federal Sales Tax Can Be Checked Only by Election of a Democratic Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN D. DINGELL
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, the expressed desire of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means to retain "a broad excise-tax base" is strictly in accord with the Republican sentiment in Congress for a Federal sales tax. This dangerous trend is unmistakable and can only be checked by the people in November.

To get reelected in 1946, the Republicans promised to cut excise taxes back to 1942 levels. This would have fulfilled the promise made by Congress at my insistence, at the time the war excise taxes were imposed, that they should terminate 6 months after the end of the war.

Typical of all Republican campaign pledges to do something for all the people, the first act of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON], chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means in the Eightieth Congress, was to report out a bill to continue the temporary wartime excise tax rates "indefinitely"—legislative parlance for "permanently."

Later, in open hearings of the Ways and Means Committee on May 28, 1947, the gentleman from Minnesota announced, in direct contradiction of his election promise to reduce excise taxes, that—

> It is the hope of the committee to be able to shift much of the burden that is now being carried by the income-tax group, which includes almost everyone, over to the excises, at least in part.

Ways and Means hearings contain dozens of references by Republican Members in favor of a Federal sales tax. And one committee member, the gentleman from California [Mr. GEARHART] has already introduced a bill calling for a 10-percent general sales tax at the manufacturer's level.

The most recent statement by the gentleman from Minnesota is strictly in accord with the report last winter of the so-called Magill Federal Tax Study Committee of New York bankers and Wall Street lawyers appointed by him. This report urged reductions in income taxes primarily for the wealthy, and the substitution therefor of excise or sales taxes which fall most heavily upon the poor, and this is precisely the record of the Eightieth Congress.

After the third successive veto by President Truman, the Knutson rich-relief income- and estate-tax reduction bill finally became law. But the Republicans knew there was no chance of passing a sales tax over the President's veto.

Now the Republicans and the gentleman from Minnesota, the Ways and Means chairman, again need votes, so they hope once again to deceive the people by implying that they favor reduction or repeal of some excise taxes—but they are not specific and do not say which ones.

Meanwhile, the gentleman from Minnesota also promises still another income tax reduction for the wealthy, which would leave just that much more of the Federal war debt to be paid off by excise and sales taxes.

For years I have been among those Democrats on the Committee on Ways and Means who have fought resolutely against a Federal sales tax. In the last session of Congress, I introduced a bill to repeal the war excise tax rates on transportation, telephone and telegraph bills, handbags, baby oil and baby powder, cosmetics, and the poor man's entertainment—the movies. I shall continue to oppose Federal sales and excise taxes and to urge a sharply progressive income tax with adequate personal exemptions as the best standard of ability to pay.

Sales and excise taxes are bad for the following reasons:

First. Such taxes must be paid even by people on old-age assistance or on charity, who do not earn enough to support themselves.

Second. People with large families and small incomes who must spend all they earn to live must pay more taxes than other people with smaller families and larger incomes who are able to save a large part of their incomes.

Third. Such taxes are "hidden"—people do not realize how much they pay during a year.

Fourth. Such taxes discriminate against businesses whose products are taxed by inducing the public to buy nontaxable competing products.

Fifth. Such taxes affect the freedom of consumer choice—a person may send an air-mail letter rather than a telegram, because of the Federal tax on telegrams, even though sending a telegram would otherwise be more desirable.

Sixth. Such taxes enter into the cost of doing business of firms using taxable articles, and the amount of the tax included in the manufacturer's selling price is marked up by all middlemen from the wholesaler to the retailer. This pyramiding means that the consumer pays much more than the actual amount of the tax collected from the manufacturer.

Seventh. In times of depression, such taxes make it all the more difficult for people to buy what they need to live.

Eighth. We cannot have a sound tax system unless we know who pays the taxes. It is not always possible to tell who actually bears the burden of sales or excise taxes, for increasing the price of an article by the amount of the tax in some cases may cut into the volume of sales so greatly as to reduce the net income of the business.

Ninth. Such taxes make hard times harder, since the limited purchasing power of the people is further reduced by the sales or excise taxes they pay.

Tenth. Such taxes interfere with States that rely on sales taxes for revenue. This problem, which was considered last year at the conference of State governors with Members of Congress at Chicago, that I was privileged to attend, was more recently recognized in the 1948 Republican platform, which suggested that—

> The Federal Government shall, as soon as practicable, withdraw or reduce those taxes which can best be administered by local governments, with particular consideration of excise taxes.

But I suppose the gentleman from Minnesota should not be expected to be familiar with, or to support, the Republican platform.

OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, the ability to buy food, fuel, clothing, all the things we consider necessities in the degree to which we have become accustomed, is beyond our reach. It is no wonder that people are complaining, but high prices were certain to come because of the administration's extravagance and its foreign policy, and they will stay with us just as long as those policies continue.

As I have time and again pointed out, there is a limit to what we have, what we can produce, what we can give away. The same pound of meat, of butter, the same yard of cloth, foot of building material, or pound of metal, cannot be used at the same time by two individuals.

Price fixing and rationing is not the remedy so long as we continue to give to foreign governments billions upon billions of dollars with which to bid against us in our own markets.

We may limit the price which the farmer may charge for a hog or a steer, which United States Steel may charge American buyers for a ton of steel or iron, a pound of nails, but, just so long as we furnish other nations the dollars to go into the open market, and, without limit, bid as they do against us, against you and me, the farmer and the industrialist—everyone—is going to sell to the highest bidder—that is human nature—and we who buy will pay the resulting high price.

I have consistently and vigorously fought against waste and extravagance—another inflationary practice—and the excessive giving to other governments, which are playing world politics—some of them using what we give to prepare for a third world war—and I shall continue to fight for those policies.

The United States—big, rich, and powerful as it is—cannot forever continue to give away more than it produces, remain safe, prosperous, its people happy and contented.

I believe in charity, in being generous, but, over and above all, we must take care of our own people, our national welfare, first. Always, the welfare of our Nation has been my first thought, guiding my every action. That will be my future policy.

Our World of 1948 and After

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE H. BENDER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, there is not a man or woman in the world today who is not deeply concerned over the future. We are concerned over our personal lives. We are no less troubled over the outlook for the whole human family. For the first time in centuries, the elements of conflict, the fear of an uncertain future, have come to dominate the thinking of every spokesman of an entire generation.

We live in an era of crisis, moving from day to day in dread of atomic destruction, of renewed warfare, of almost soul-destroying tension. What can we do in this moment? We must recognize that the struggle before us is moral. Intelligent people in every sector of the world recognize this fact. We have launched a program of assistance for the needy children of Europe and Asia. But side by side with the ships carrying food and fuel, there travel cargoes of ammunition.

This kind of dual provisioning will not achieve the goals of peace and justice in the world of tomorrow. The terrors of time will not be diminished by this uneasy balance of bread and bullets.

Today we have fallen short of the moral greatness which these times demand. We are faltering in the steadfastness of purpose which marked the American spirit in the days of our founding. Complex problems have blurred our vision.

The men, women, and children of tomorrow will not live by bread alone. They too must have the inspiration and the courage of a clearly perceived goal if they are to go on living and building and creating. America must give them this inspiration and this courage.

By our own example of achievement in this God-given land, we can rekindle the fading lights of Europe and Asia. Let us take the steps we see before us to create a still fuller life for our own people, to assure their economic well-being, to protect their health, to preserve their liberties, to safeguard their privileges, and to perpetuate these cherished traditions for their posterity.

Such an example of a great nation, in which none regards himself as exploited, in which all are equal before the law, is the antidote to the Marxist doctrine of hate and struggle. If we live by the Sermon on the Mount neither we nor our children shall fear for the future

Patriotism in Peacetime

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE MacKINNON
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. MACKINNON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include a speech I delivered to the Independence Day celebration sponsored by the North Side American Legion Post at North Commons Park, Minneapolis, Minn., on July 4 and 5:

Mr. Chairman and fellow Americans, it is a high honor to be invited to address you in commemoration of the foundation of our Republic. Because this is our great patriotic festival, it has become the custom throughout the length and breadth of our land to commemorate the occasion with speeches fitting to the occasion.

In our Nation this has been the custom for 172 years, for it was 172 years ago that our Nation came into existence. As the history of nations go, that is a long time. In these times there is a little too much tendency to take the continued existence of our Nation and our institutions for granted.

However, we have only to look around us to find that nations come and nations go. Those that have been in existence 172 years without major change are something of a rarity.

We would do well to examine at this time the principal factors that have made our Nation great.

As you all know, our Government is a republic. However, it may not be generally known that a republic is the hardest type of government to keep functioning properly. The founders of the Constitution knew this. History records that, after the Constitutional Convention adjourned in Philadelphia, one of the citizens stopped Benjamin Franklin and inquired, "What kind of a government have you given us, Ben?"

Franklin's reply was instantaneous and illustrated the deep knowledge of government possessed by our founding fathers. He said, "A republic, if you can keep it."

So far, we have kept it. Because I, for one, want to be sure that we continue to keep it, I believe it appropriate today to analyze briefly (1) why we have kept it, and (2) what is necessary for us to do to continue to keep it.

Foremost, as to the reasons we have been able to preserve our Republic, I would place the high patriotism of our citizenry. What is patriotism? As you and I understand and feel it, patriotism is love of country. Patriotism is personified in this audience by the war heroes, parents, and relatives of deceased veterans who today sleep on the far-flung battlefields throughout the world—from the shores of Normandy to the sands of Iwo Jima—beneath the oceans' waves, and in our hallowed national cemeteries here at home. Patriotism is also personified by the activity of the North Side American Legion Post in making this celebration possible, and by similar activities by other veterans' organizations.

However, patriotism is more than love of country. It is loyalty, shrinking from no sacrifice, seeking no reward, save the honor and triumph of one's country.

What of the future? What must we do to preserve our Republic?

We must realize our way of life is under attack by clever subversionists. Their attack is becoming more shrewd. It requires intelligent analysis by our people to combat their activities.

There is nothing constant about their program. They advocate everything at some time or other if it will tend to disrupt. They know the end they seek and they care naught about the means. This cold war is a war that is not a war. We live in peace that is not peace. We are, in fact, living in a strange period of history when forces of aggression are operating throughout the world in a manner never before encountered.

The lessons of history cannot for that reason be totally relied upon.

If there is any lesson that we should have learned by now it is that the security of any nation, however strong it may be today, is inextricably tied up with keeping abreast of the times in world affairs and in scientific progress.

The destinies of numerous peoples are in the balance. Their movement toward liberty is dependent upon our making liberty succeed here.

Our own fate, too, is dependent upon the success of liberty elsewhere.

For the future, the safety of our Republic lies in the vigilant, active, and intelligent patriotism of the American people. Our future is in your hands.

Republican Budget-Paring Claims Heavily Padded

OF
HON. JOHN D. DINGELL
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, Republican tax and appropriations leaders have heavily padded their claims of large-scale paring of President Truman's 1949 budget by the Eightieth Congress, inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of July 7, 1948, and July 20, 1948.

Ways and Means Chairman KNUTSON and Appropriations Chairman TABER have engaged in an exhibition of statistical sleight-of-hand that would do credit to a professional magician.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] points with pride to the attainment in fiscal year ending June 30, 1948, in a Democratic administration, of a budgetary surplus of $8,400,000,000. In a statement issued on June 2, 1948, he referred to the reduction in the public debt during the past 2 years, but he failed to mention that his rich-relief income and estate tax reduction bill threatens us with a deficit in fiscal year 1949—in a period of peak prosperity.

To cover up this deficit, the Republican majority in Congress inserted in the Foreign Assistance Act a provision to make-believe that $3,000,000,000 of 1949 Marshall-plan aid were spent in 1948. This was accomplished by juggling the books to charge $3,000,000,000 of 1949 expenditures against the surplus for 1948.

As the Washington Post editorialized on July 5, 1948:

Such juggling with budget figures will not deceive the initiated or increase by a single dollar the actual amount of the surpluses available for debt retirement during the two fiscal years 1948 and 1949.

Strictly of the same pattern are the assertions by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], at page A4364 of the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, that the President's budget requests for fiscal year 1949 were reduced by more than $2,700,000,000. As indicated in the accompanying table, the net reduction actually made by the second session of the Eightieth Congress through June 20, 1948, in all specific requests submitted by the President, was $1,008,031,936. This amount must be still further reduced by the $687,000,000 increase in tax refunds in fiscal year 1949 resulting from the passage of the premature tax-reduction bill over the President's veto.

The table shows that at least $1,300,000,000 of the claimed reduction in appropriations have been offset by increases made by Congress in contract authorizations and loan authorizations above the amount requested by the President. Again, it is a case of robbing Peter to pay Paul. But the gentleman from New York wants to avoid the charge of robbery to provide the budgetary reductions for which he claims credit. However, he cannot deny that the increases in these other types of authorizations commit the Government to expenditures just as surely as do appropriations. Indeed, Congress has frequently used such authorizations as a substitute for appropriations.

The remainder of the discrepancy in figures of the gentleman from New York is attributable to deficiency appropriations that Congress will have to make in order to restore reductions in veterans' readjustment benefits, pensions, and services, and in Post Office operating expenses. These items total in excess of $300,000,000. Surely, even a Republican Congress would not impair the care of veterans, or the postal service.

To President Truman and Budget Director Webb must go the credit for trimming the original requests of the executive department and agencies by nearly $7,000,000,000. Such further reductions as were made by Congress endanger Federal programs for public power, reclamation, conservation, and flood control.

It is indeed a sad commentary on the Eightieth Congress that the ranking Republican Members of the House in charge of Government revenues and appropriations should have found it necessary to present such a distorted picture of their record. Just what subterfuges they would use next year, if they should be continued in power, is not now clear. Fortunately, the American people in November can rectify their mistake of 1946 in electing a Republican Congress.

Summary of action on appropriations and other authorizations by the Eightieth Congress, second session (through June 20, 1948)

Type of authorization	Budget request	Amount enacted	Increase (+) decrease (−)
Annual definite appropriations	$35,391,527,654	[1] $32,683,763,931	−$2,707,763,799

[1] Contrasts with the over-all decrease of $2,741,481,292 shown in tabulations in CONGRESSIONAL RECORD Appendix, on pp. A4364, A4388, A4601, and A4604. The difference of $33,717,569 is due to the omission from the Appendix tabulation of a $35,000,000 decrease from Budget estimates as enacted for the civil service retirement and disability fund, and to omission of an over-all increase of $1,282,431 in several other comparatively small items.

[2] Agrees with tabulation in CONGRESSIONAL RECORD Appendix, on p. A4600.

The Shameful Record of the Republican Eightieth Congress on Minimum-Wage Legislation

OF
HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS
OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement prepared by me on the failure of the Congress to enact minimum-wage legislation; also a statement issued by me on May 14, 1947.

There being no objection, the statements were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS, OF PENNSYLVANIA, ON MINIMUM-WAGE LEGISLATION IN THE EIGHTIETH CONGRESS

In the midst of this unprecedented boom in the American economy, with our national income well over $200,000,000,000 a year, with more than 60,000,000 persons gainfully employed, with profits at a level never before realized in American history—and with prices, too, unfortunately at record levels—it may come as a shock to many Americans to learn that thousands of their fellow citizens putting in 40 hours a week, full time, at jobs connected with the flow of interstate commerce have been earning less than a starvation $16 a week—the legal minimum wage—and that several hundreds of thousands are earning only that much or a little bit more.

This is astouding. It is unbelievable, but, unfortunately, true.

The Minimum Wage Act, known as the Fair Labor Standards Act, was passed in 1938. That year, it will be recalled, was a year of recession. We had still not emerged completely from the terrible depression of the early thirties, when the demand for governmental economy reached such proportions as to force severe curtailment of many programs of the Government designed to maintain and increase the purchasing power of the great mass of our people at the lowest level of our economy. Public works and relief works projects were cut back, the so-called pump priming substantially halted. The result was the recession, because these steps toward economy in Government were forced upon our Government prematurely by the confirmed optimists who believed that the depression had been licked long before.

It was in this atmosphere that the first minimum wage law was enacted. There was still large unemployment and brisk competition for jobs. Wages were low but so were prices. A 40-cent minimum wage was considered a good start toward achieving a sense of fairness for the wage earners of the United States. It might be mentioned, however, in passing, that this 40-cent figure was bitterly assailed by many presumably intelligent businessmen who contended it might bankrupt American industry.

Nevertheless, after passage of the act and after unsuccessful efforts to contest it in the courts, it went into effect and gave great promise of raising living standards for our people. The intention was clear that when, as, and if the 40-cent minimum should become obsolete, it would be changed.

The need for change became obvious in the Seventy-ninth Congress and the Senate did pass a bill over some rather bitter opposition. The most we could get, however, at that time, was a minimum of 60 cents an hour. Powerful interests thereupon succeeded in blocking any action in the House Committee on Education and Labor. However, both parties were flatly promising adequate minimum wage legislation in the campaign of 1946 and when the Eightieth Congress convened in January 1947, the proposals of President Truman for a higher minimum wage were regarded as having an excellent chance, if not of passage in the form he proposed, then at least of proper consideration, and some action was considered inevitable.

The Republican leadership of the Eightieth Congress periodically promised action on minimum-wage legislation. As we close the Eightieth Congress, it is obvious that those promises were empty. The minimum wage still remains $16 a week for a 40-hour week.

Not a single bill of the many introduced in the Eightieth Congress to improve the minimum-wage features of the Fair Labor Standards Act was reported out of either the House or Senate Labor Committee. Both committees were exceedingly alert to demands to restrict the rights of labor and prompt in reporting out punitive legislation.

But when it came to improving living standards at the lowest level of our economy, neither committee could find the time to give due consideration to the need. Meanwhile, the Judiciary Committees of the Congress acted promptly early in the first session to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act to protect industry from the application of Supreme Court decisions in the so-called portal-to-portal cases.

The record of the Republican Eightieth Congress on minimum wage legislation, as on so many other aspects of human need is shameful.

President Truman has proposed a minimum wage of 75 cents an hour or $30 a week. This is hardly excessive in view of present day living costs. There are nearly 2,000,000 American wage earners employed in positions covered by the Fair Labor Standards Act who would benefit from such an increase, for they now make less than 75 cents an hour. The number is not significantly less than it was a year ago even though wages, profits, prices generally have all risen since last year and taxes for the well-to-do have been materially lowered. But here are nearly 2,000,000 Americans working 40 hours a week, full time, and earning less than $30 a week. It is a small group, perhaps, but it still represents nearly 10 percent of all of the citizens in America covered by the wage-hour act. There are undoubtedly many millions not covered by the wage-hour act who are also earning less than $30 a week, for a 40-hour week, but they are beyond the reach of Federal legislation since their employment is not regarded as being in interstate commerce.

Of the 21,500,000 employees covered by the act, about 500,000 or so earn less than than $24 a week, or 60 cents an hour. This is also an astounding figure.

Even though the Republican-controlled Congress refused throughout the Eightieth Congress to initiate any action to increase the minimum wage and thus help these many thousands and thousands of inadequately paid Americans to have their living standards raised even a little, the Senate did have one opportunity during the Eightieth Congress actually to vote on a modest increase in the minimum wage. It refused, at the direction of its Republican leadership, to take advantage of that opportunity and sidestepped the issue. Presumably, at that time, in March of 1947, it was only delaying the issue for later consideration, but as the Eightieth Congress ends it is now obvious that the delay was meant to be fatal.

This was the situation in the Senate on March 21, 1947:

We were then voting on the so-called portal-to-portal bill and on amendments to it. Since the portal bill dealt exclusively with the Fair Labor Standards Act and its coverage, and since in many respects it relaxed protections of that act for the individual employee and restricted others, I offered an amendment to strengthen the act a little in the direction of a higher minimum wage. My amendment called for the increasing of the minimum wage, from 40 to 60 cents an hour, from $16 to $24 a week. This amendment was not intended to bring the minimum wage up to necessary levels. It was intended only as a stopgap emergency measure until the Congress had time to come forward with adequate minimum-wage legislation. I had intended making it 65 cents, but was told by numerous Senators that if I reduced the figure of my emergency amendment to 60 cents it would be considered so noncontroversial that it would be agreed to immediately and provide us with a means for immediately raising the wage levels of about 500,000 American employees at least.

Seven other Democratic Senators joined me as cosponsors of this amendment.

Immediately after I called up this noncontroversial emergency increase in the minimum wage to 60 cents an hour—which was the same figure the Senate had agreed to in a minimum-wage bill passed in the Seventy-ninth Congress—the chairman of the Republican policy committee, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT], made a motion to lay the amendment on the table, that is, to kill it. The motion to table was not debatable under the rules of the Senate. That meant that Senators had to vote immediately on whether or not to table my amendment, and if they refused to table it, then they would have an opportunity to vote on the amendment itself.

On the roll call vote only three Republican Senators joined 29 Democrats in voting against tabling the amendment—in effect thereby voting in favor of the 60-cent minimum—while all the rest of the Republicans present and a small minority of Democrats voted with Senator TAFT and the motion to table the amendment carried by the wide margin of 57 to 32. That killed minimum-wage legislation of any kind in the Eightieth Congress, for the issue never again came to a vote in either the Senate or the House.

After the vote was taken, some Senators thereupon had an opportunity to express their reasons for voting as they did on the motion to table. The reasons were quite interesting. Senator TAFT led off by saying that there was then pending before the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, of which he is chairman, the whole issue of minimum-wage legislation. He said:

"Our committee proposes to take up the matter. Certainly by my motion to lay on the table I did not intend to indicate necessarily opposition to the raising of the minimum wage. Last year I voted to raise it from 40 cents to 60 cents. That question cannot be considered except in relation to the various exemptions now contained in the act, and the effect on the different industries concerned. I can only say that our committee will take the matter up at the earliest possible moment and give full consideration to amendments to the basic provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act."

He told the Senate that his reason for tabling my amendment was that he did not consider it properly related to the matter before the Senate (the portal-to-portal bill drastically revising the Fair Labor Standards Act), and that it involved a question then pending before his committee where, he indicated, it would receive prompt attention.

One Republican Senator thereupon explained that he voted to table the amendment because he felt that 60 cents an hour, the figure proposed in the amendment, was ridiculously low and that it should have been higher.

I then pointed out that there was merit in such an argument, except that by virtue of the tabling of my amendment, and that was March 21, 1947, the minimum wage was still only 40 cents an hour, and that it could have been raised immediately to 60 cents an hour pending action by the Republican leadership on bringing out an adequate bill. I said further that had by amendment been amended by that Senator or any other Senator to a more reasonable level, say 75 cents, I would have been happy to have joined in supporting such a move.

As it was, we got no increase at that time and there has been no increase since that time and the minimum wage remains at 40 cents an hour, $16 a week, in a period of the worst inflation we have known in this country in many years.

Since then I have introduced a bill of my own which did nothing more than provide for an emergency 65-cent minimum wage, and I also joined as cosponsor of two comprehensive bills to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act, including provisions in one case for a minimum of 75 cents an hour. All three bills of mine, along with all other bills introduced in the Eightieth Congress on minimum-wage legislation, remained bottled up throughout this 2-year term of Congress in the Labor Committees of the respective Houses of Congress.

And so we have this situation continuing in which about 200,000 Americans are earning less than 55 cents an hour in employment in interstate commerce and a good many of those, according to records of the Wage and Hour Administration, were actually being paid less than 40 cents an hour until the Labor Department, with limited investigatory personnel due to budget cuts enforced by the Republican Congress in their appropriation, was able to ferret out these violations and see justice done by raising their wages to the legal minimum of $16 a week. And altogether nearly 800,000, including those I just cited, are being paid less than 65 cents an hour.

When I introduced my bill to raise the minimum to 65 cents on May 14, 1947, the day the President signed the portal-to-portal bill, I issued the following statement which I think still remains relevant to this discussion.

STATEMENT BY HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS, OF PENNSYLVANIA

MAY 14, 1947.

In signing the portal-to-portal bill, undoubtedly with many misgivings, the President has leaned over extremely far to cooperate with the dominant faction in Congress. I think it is now about time for the Congress in turn to show at least a little inclination to cooperate with the President on some of the vital domestic problems we now face.

The President has expressed profound concern over the possible effect of this legislation upon the maintenance of fair labor standards for our workers. He has, at the same time, expressed the hope that these fears will not materialize, basing his hopes on the interpretations to be made by the courts and also on supplemental action he believes the Congress will take.

Regardless of the personal opinions any of us may have on the legislation, the fact remains that it is now the law of the land. It is necessary, then, to make sure that this law is administered with adequate funds and that the basic law it modifies is materially strengthened. These are urgent requirements if the fears expressed by the President over the legislation are not to become actualities.

The President has asked for the immediate adoption of a 65-cent minimum wage law, correctly describing the present 40-cent minimum as far from adequate. I would say it is shamefully inadequate.

During debate on this bill in the Senate, I offered an amendment which would have raised the minimum wage immediately to 60 cents an hour. This was a very low figure, but one which I used in that amendment on assurance from many Senators that it could be put through with no opposition, whereas a higher figure, a more adequate figure, might be a highly controversial addition to an already controversial bill.

My amendment was an emergency attempt to help meet an emergency situation. Had it been adopted, I would have then pressed for further amendment of the Fair Labor Standards Act at a later time to bring the minimum wage up to adequate levels.

My amendment was tabled, however, on motion of Senator TAFT, after the Senator from Ohio promised that the Senate Labor Committee would give prompt consideration to this very subject at the earliest possible moment.

Since then, however, the Labor Committee has taken no action on this problem, and the minimum wage is still only 40 cents an hour.

As a result, I announce now that I am introducing a bill to increase the minimum wage to 65 cents an hour—the figure suggested by the President. It is my personal belief that when the Labor Committee investigates this subject it will be convinced that the President has not set his sights high enough and will recommend a higher minimum than 65 cents. I think, however, we must start somewhere, and so I have incorporated the President's figure of 65 cents in this amendment.

I urge the Senate, and the Senate Labor Committee, to take up this problem immediately. Our economy is in real danger because of the steadily shrinking purchasing power of our workers. With the flood of consumer goods now coming off assembly lines and out of the factories, it is imperative that our workers—in all sections of the country—have incomes sufficient to enable them to buy the goods they help produce.

The President cited the importance of strengthening wage-hour enforcement machinery in view of the new 2-year statute of limitations on claims arising from violations. This will mean, as the President said, added funds rather than fewer funds for the Enforcement Division.

I tried to warn of this fact when the Labor Department appropriation bill was before the Senate, but apparently without much success, for the bill we passed here, although allowing some increases over the House bill, nevertheless provides far from adequate funds to police wage-hour violations.

The action which the Congress takes in the immediate future to strengthen the wage-hour program will indicate to what extent the Republican majority in Congress is really concerned with making cooperation with the President a two-way street.

The Southern Branch of the Elizabeth River

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PORTER HARDY, JR.
OF VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, Norfolk and Portsmouth—the two largest cities in my district—are separated by the Elizabeth River. Docks and wharves and piers and storage facilities are located all along both sides of the banks of this river and its branches. This is the nerve center of commercial and industrial activity in the Hampton Roads area. Since the beginning of our Nation, our port has been one of the principal commercial links between the North American Continent and the rest of the world.

In keeping with congressional authorization and appropriations, the improvements made in our harbor by the Army engineers have brought untold benefits not only to the Hampton Roads communities but to the Nation.

Although on the Elizabeth River proper commercial sites are almost completely utilized, there is yet room for commercial and industrial expansion along the Southern and Eastern Branches of the river. The Norfolk Naval Shipyard is located on the Southern Branch and it is one of the Navy's largest and finest. Up to the limits of the shipyard's reservation, there is ample water to handle our largest battleships and carriers, but beyond that point upstream there is only a 25-foot channel.

Prior to the war the existing channel was adequate to take care of oceangoing steamships, and as a consequence much of the industry of Norfolk and Portsmouth is located along this river. These plants import large quantities of material from foreign countries and it is necessary that they have deep-water terminal facilities to accommodate full shiploads of cargo. But today's ships are larger, and they draw more water, and a 25-foot channel is inadequate. Ships destined for docks along the Southern Branch now have to discharge a part of their cargoes before entering the shallower channel. This entails tremendous cost in handling and reshipping material which otherwise could be discharged directly onto the wharves of the industrial plants.

Along this river are lumber mills and yards and wood-treating establishments, creosoting plants, and numerous chemical and fertilizer plants. Besides these there are numerous large oil storage facilities each with dockage and equipment to handle oceangoing tankers. Today and in recent years these docking facilities and pumping equipment are little used because present-day tankers can no longer negotiate the channel. This situation was one of the major causes of the fuel-oil shortage in the Norfolk area in particular and the Atlantic seaboard in general last winter. It is a situation which urgently needs correcting.

The channel up the Southern Branch must be deepened and widened in order to accommodate the tankers and dry-cargo ships which are needed to serve the area. The present international situation makes the existing conditions on the Southern Branch all the more intolerable. If we should again be forced into war, it would be imperative that this channel be opened to permit full utilization of the plants and storage facilities in this section.

It was my pleasure to work closely with representatives of the Hampton Roads Maritime Association and of private concerns with a view toward early deepening and widening of this channel. Along with various interested people, I appeared before the Subcommittee on Rivers and Harbors and urged authorization of this work. We presented facts and showed potential benefits many times the cost of the project. Property owners in the area furnished assurances of their cooperation in protecting the banks of the river and in providing areas for disposing of the dredged material.

The committee recognized the merit of the project and approved it, and subsequently it was approved by this House and by the Senate.

The authorization has been granted. Planning has been completed, but now we need funds to bring the project to realization.

I feel that this situation is urgent and I am sure that if you were as familiar with the need as I am you would all concur. I had hoped that a supplemental appropriations bill would be presented in this special session and that funds for the Southern Branch could be included. Since this was not possible, I am calling the matter to the attention of the House Members now. The full amount needed for the project should be appropriated for use during the next fiscal year.

The American People Are Entitled to More Information Regarding American Foreign Policies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD H. REES
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. REES. Mr. Speaker, I am disappointed that the President in his message to the special session of Congress did not advise the American people of important developments in respect to the foreign situation. The negotiations with Russia which relate to the occupation of the American zone in Berlin are troubling the people of our country. What disturbs them most is the lack of information from the President and the Secretary of State with regard to this situation.

Since the President determined that a special session of Congress was advisable, I had hoped, and I am sure this hope was shared by other Americans, that the Chief Executive would consider the foreign situation of sufficient importance to deal with it in his message to Congress.

The apparent failure of Government officials to provide for a territorial corridor into Berlin has precipitated a serious crisis. The American people did not make that mistake. It was caused by the lack of judgment on the part of representatives charged with the responsibility of protecting American interests abroad. Furthermore, the American people were not aware of this development because the executive branch had failed to advise them of facts and circumstances surrounding agreements with Russia. To what extent other Berlin crises have developed at the present time is not known because the American people do not have adequate information.

This is not the time to withhold facts from the American people. When the President called the special session of Congress, that was the appropriate time to discuss frankly with the representatives of the people the activities in relation to our foreign policy. Gen. Lucius Clay, who is in charge of the American occupation army in Germany, was recalled to the United States to report to the President. He spent several days in Washington conferring with the President, the Secretary of State, and the Secretary of National Defense. He has returned to Germany. Congress, as well as the American people, know little more now than they did prior to his visit to the United States.

Although the question of maintaining a sound domestic economy and the problem of the rising cost of living are paramount issues, they cannot be separated from our foreign policy. Living costs are influenced by our foreign policy. The tremendous amount of food and other goods shipped to foreign countries and paid for from our funds to some extent is bound to influence the economy of this country.

The impact of the foreign-aid program upon our economy makes it important for us to know more about our foreign relations and commitments so that American farmers, businessmen, and the laboring people can estimate the extent to which goods and services will be required abroad in the future. The Economic Cooperation Administration charged with the responsibility of administering our foreign-aid program has been in operation since April 1948. The American people are entitled to a report concerning its operations and accomplishments.

The people of the United States are entitled to frankness from the Chief Executive and the Secretary of State. The most serious aspect of the foreign situation at the present time is that no one outside of the Chief Executive and his most confidential advisers knows anything about it. We Americans receive rumors and hints as to developments, but we have no official statements or facts upon which to base our conclusions.

The domestic economies of the democracies of the world have been shaken, some beyond repair. Only the United States remains as the last hope for the freedom-loving peoples of the world. In our efforts to work out solutions to the common problems of these democracies against totalitarian governments, we must be informed as to the progress and developments in our foreign relations. The so-called bipartisan foreign policy must not be used as a cloak behind which to conceal pertinent facts from our people. In my judgment, since immediate passage of domestic legislation was required and the situation was of such importance as to call the Congress into special session, it is clear that the President should have dealt in some measure upon developments abroad which have a direct effect not only upon our domestic economy, but upon the general welfare of the people of this country. In wartime there may be reasons for withholding certain facts, but in peacetime the people and the Congress ought to be informed with regard to negotiations and agreements that are made on their behalf.

Let me not be misunderstood. I recognize the difficulties involved in dealing with a nation such as Soviet Russia. However, it is my belief that the wisdom of the American people should not be underestimated, nor should the Chief Executive assume that the American people do not have sufficient intelligence to understand facts if they are presented properly.

I have a deep and abiding faith in the ability of our countrymen to work out the solutions to our many grave national and international problems. However, without sufficient facts and information from those to whom such knowledge is available, we cannot achieve success. If America is to maintain its place of leadership among the democracies of the world, its people must have all available facts and information upon which to determine their decisions.

Famous Resorts

OF

HON. PORTER HARDY, JR.

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, as this special session draws to a close, there is evidence among all the Members of unusual fatigue and ennui. Several of my colleagues have spoken to me about the possibility of securing reservations at the famous resorts in my district. I want to commend to each of you the facilities which my district offers for relaxation and recreation, and to invite you to come down and rest.

Virginia Beach is the finest ocean beach in the world, and in addition to the sea—and the sand—and the sunshine—it is studded with comfortable hotels and with such a diversity of recreational pastimes as satisfy all the varied inclinations of the Members of this body.

If you prefer the quieter waters of the Chesapeake Bay you will find splendid accommodations at Ocean View—or Ocean Park—or Chesapeake Beach, all close to the birthplace of our Nation at Cape Henry.

If you are disciples of Izaak Walton, there are unexcelled fishing grounds both in fresh and salt water, or if you like the beauties of nature, unsullied by the encroachments of civilization, visit beautiful Lake Drummond. Side excursions in the Second Virginia District will prove both profitable and edifying. We have a variety of attractions and a scope of interests historical, natural, and economic, which I believe are unparalleled in any other congressional district.

A trip around our harbor would demonstrate as fine a port as can be found anywhere. You will see exceptional port facilities, steamers entering and leaving to and from every seaport in the world. You will see the world's largest naval base and a concentration of air activities at our naval air station. Our navy yard is not only one of the largest and best equipped, but its wartime record of performance set an example for the rest of the Nation.

While observing our vast port you should also look at the work of the Army engineers in port development. Then you members of the Appropriations Committee will better understand why I insisted on the appropriations of $108,000 to complete the project on the eastern branch of the Elizabeth River. In addition, you members of the Public Works Committee will see for yourselves the need for the work which I described to you when you were considering and granted my request for authorization to deepen and widen the channel of the southern branch of the Elizabeth River. All along this waterway you will see oil-storage plants now out of reach of ocean tankers that have been built larger and heavier than prewar vessels. Because the channel is not deep enough to accommodate the new ships, these storage facilities are not used to maximum capacity and efficiency and some have been practically abandoned. That's why our people were out of heating oil last winter. That's why many houses in this whole area were cold. That's why long before our State program was worked out I helped our city officials convince the Secretary of the Navy that he should lend us some heating oil, from the Navy storage at nearby Craney Island.

Before you leave the harbor, glance under the piers and along the water's edge and observe the oil scum which has accumulated. In spite of fines, ships have been illegally discharging bilge and water ballast into our coastal waters. That has been an irritating situation. But look at our newly inaugurated service which receives oil-bearing refuse from ships in the harbor and reclaims the oil and you will feel a sense of satisfaction at our approach toward eliminating this menace of oil pollution because you gentlemen granted my request and appropriated the $50,000 with which the project was started.

I want to point out also, particularly to you members of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, our shipbuilding and ship-repair industry. I want you to see our numerous railroad terminals and storage facilities. Then when you talk to our freight forwarders and exporters you will better comprehend my interest in the ships' subsidy bill and other legislation pertaining to our merchant marine. You will also better understand why I have been pressing for greater movement of foreign-relief shipments through our port. You will see that my arguments were sound and in the interest of efficiency and economy.

While you are in Norfolk you certainly will want to mail some souvenir post cards to your friends and constituents saying, "I am having a fine time, wish you were here," so you will stop by the post office and talk to some of the clerks—I said talk to them—but be sure to make a mental note of what you see. You members of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee recall all too well how I kept urging you to make adequate salary increases for our postal and civil-service employees. I submitted the actual budget of one of our top-grade post office clerks who is married and has two children. It showed that out of his monthly check he had $1.04 left without anything for clothing or recreation. If these boys' apparel seems to be a little threadbare and ragged around the edges and their visages have a worried aspect, you will know it is because all of their income goes for bare necessities. Then take a look around outside the post-office building and see all of the equipment parked out on the streets. That is because we don't have an adequate post-office garage, and the equipment must take the weather. We have the site for the garage now, construction has been authorized, but the Public Buildings Administration tells me there are no funds except for drawing the plans. We are going to have to have the money to build this garage in order to save our trucks and equipment and it should be appropriated promptly.

A ride to Norview will show you the new post office substation that is being erected there to provide a better service for this new and growing community. You will be proud of having appropriated the money to make the operation of this substation possible. In Suffolk, another fast growing city, a contract station has recently been provided to serve the colored population in the Jericho section.

Now take a trip through our agricultural sections and you will see some of our country's finest farms, many of which are back off the main highways. When you see our fine vegetable crops, potatoes, grain, and peanuts, you will understand why I argued with you until you approved the peanut bill I introduced last year, and why I have striven for sound general farm legislation. Talk to the farmers. They are happier than they used to be. Perhaps they have recently gotten electricity, and perhaps we have been successful in getting an extension of a rural mail route so that they don't have to walk so far to the mail box. Suddenly it will dawn on you why I have been particularly interested in the conservation of our soils resources, and in a practical-farm program so that the Nation's agriculture can stay in a healthy economic condition. Soil fertility is one of our Nation's principal assets and I am convinced that national prosperity is dependent upon the prosperity of our farm people.

Generally speaking, the splendid farm lands in my district are not ravaged by floods, but if you happen to be in the Back Bay section when strong winds are from the wrong direction, you may see farms and crops submerged. Or after a series of heavy rains in the headwaters of the Meherrin and Nottaway Rivers, you may find drowning crops on the fertile lowlands. These are the reasons I worried some of you until you gave authority for the Army engineers to study ways of correcting the flood menace in Princess Anne and Norfolk Counties and until you voted to instruct the Soil Conservation Service to make a study of the Meherrin and Nottaway Rivers.

There has been a lot of talk here in Congress the past 2 years about housing. Well, circulate through our cities and view the housing projects built during the war to accommodate the influx of workers. Some of these were temporary structures built with a life expectancy of about 5 years, and many of them are depreciating rapidly. Although they have served their period of intended usefulness you will not find any vacant. A vast majority of these dilapidated places are now occupied by veterans who are unable to find anywhere else to go. This will explain somewhat my interest in the housing problem which you will recognize is so acute in my district.

Most of the people who came to our area as defense workers during wartime have stayed and become permanent residents. Local industry has absorbed these new citizens. This whole situation has put a tremendous strain on our educational institutions. It is true that when the temporary projects were built, temporary schools were built also and these schools were operated by local authorities. The educational program must continue and the continued use of school facilities built by the Government is essential to our local school boards. And so I have done the best I could to assist our localities in acquiring title to these facilities at a reasonable cost.

Your vacation in my district is now almost over, but before you leave I wish you might also get around and talk with some of our retired civil-service and railroad people. See what a struggle they are having to keep body and soul together on their meager annuities. Then you will know why I so actively supported liberalizing amendments to retirement laws. Of course, a part of the hardships felt by retired people is due to inflated prices which affect every citizen. I had hoped for more positive action in the special session to curb inflation. I had also hoped the measure to repeal the nuisance tax on oleomargarine would have been approved in the other legislative body. We passed it here in the House during the regular session and I was glad to be one of the signers of the petition which brought the bill out of the committee so it could receive consideration and action.

In our cities and towns take time to talk to some of our business people about the encroachments of monopoly and you will recognize the reason for my interest in better enforcement of antitrust laws. Talk to city and county officials about their revenue difficulties and you will better understand my intense interest in taxation and why I have been so glad to serve on the congressional committee which is working with the Conference of State Governors for a better distribution of tax sources among Federal, State, and local government.

During these past 2 years you Members of the House have supported me often in requests for things my District needed. Sometimes you have seemed to give in just to get me off your necks.

So come down and visit the Second District of Virginia. An hour's plane ride, a 200-mile drive in your car, or bus, boat, and train service are at your convenience. Take a rest—take a look—then go home feeling you have spent at least some of Uncle Sam's money wisely and well. You will find our people are the salt of the earth. Our chambers of commerce, our city and county officials, as well as the officials of our governmental establishments, will appreciate your visit and my office in the Federal Building will welcome you with open arms.

Offers Schools Communism in Action for Use as Textbook

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EVERETT M. DIRKSEN
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following correspondence from Mr. Ralph Pohek, senior consultant, American Wage Earners Foundation:

AMERICAN WAGE EARNERS FOUNDATION,
Chicago, Ill., August 5, 1948.

Hon. EVERETT M. DIRKSEN,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN DIRKSEN: Since writing you last, the foundation policy board has authorized me to renew my offer of free copies of Communism in Action to the colleges, for use as a textbook in various classes or as required reading or for reference work. Out of the 1,688 colleges to which I made this offer in March, I have had requests from 286 separate schools and colleges, some of which have asked for as high as 1,000 copies.

It is my sincere desire to see every college in America adopt this authoritative and factual document which, I am told, is the only reliable record of the actual workings of communism for the last 30 years ever published. The fact that it is a Government publication, thoroughly documented by the Library of Congress, makes it acceptable for use in educational circles, as it consists of actual facts rather than the opinions of individuals.

Among the powerful organizations which have given considerable publicity to our free distribution are the following: The Navy League of the United States mentioned it in their bulletin and many requests have been received from their members; the Polish-American Congress distributed hundreds of copies at a convention in New York City to delegates from all over the East, and the California division of the Polish-American Congress sent a copy to chapter leaders on the west coast with a personal letter in Polish, recommending study of this document and suggesting they request extra copies of the book for chapter officials. This has resulted in hundreds of requests from Polish-Americans all over the country and much gratifying editorial publicity in Polish language newspapers. Also, some very large donated ads in those same newspapers.

The Polish National Alliance, which publishes Zgoda, a semimonthly paper which has a circulation of over 300,000, has donated two good-sized ads in Polish with a coupon keyed so that the requests for the document go direct to the paper which pays the postage and furnishes the envelopes to send the book to those requesting it. Karol Piakiewicz, editor in chief of Zgoda, has been most cooperative and helpful along this line.

The Director of Adult Education of the Territory of Hawaii came into my office last month, saying he had seen Communism in Action in use in the University of Hawaii, to which we sent a large supply, and he was very much interested in securing a supply for his use in his adult education classes.

The Lions Club at Salinas, Calif., requested 65 copies, one for each of their speakers who are making talks throughout the State on the menace of communism. These were sent them and consideration is being given to further cooperation with various organizations of the same type which furnish speakers to serve clubs.

Our mutual, and highly esteemed friend, Charles Burgess, of Geneva, made a powerful talk at Elgin to the Kiwanis group and mentioned that Communism in Action was available free, and he sent me the names of several people who came to him after his talk and asked for copies.

The news in the press the last few days on just how far Communist infiltration has gone, may, I hope, awaken people to just how powerful and far reaching this influence has become.

I know you will be gratified to learn that the demand for Communism in Action remains steady. Every mail brings requests for copies from people of whom we have never heard and we are unable to trace the source through which they learned of our free distribution. The overprint on the book, "extra copies available free," accounts for a great deal of this.

The enclosed copy of one of the ads which appeared in the Negro Labor News of Houston, Tex., has accounted for many requests for this book from readers of this outstanding Negro publication. These ads were donated by the publisher of this fine paper, Mr. L. B. Rice.

In concluding this letter, I want to say, Congressman, that I and my associates extend to you our deepest thanks and gratitude for inspiring what we have been told is one of the most important books, on a vital subject, that has ever been published and that it has been a privilege to be able to make this free distribution as a contribution to real understanding of just what communism is in actual practice, in the hope that comprehension of the facts will horrify people so that the very sound of the word "communism" will make them decide that they do not want any part of it in the United States.

With all good wishes and many thanks for your fine cooperation, I am

Sincerely,

RALPH POHEK,
Senior Consultant.

A Statement on Palestine

OF

HON. SOL BLOOM

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a statement on Palestine which I have prepared. In this statement I trace my many efforts in behalf of Palestine and its upbuilding as a Jewish homeland, particularly in the last three decades from the time of the Balfour declaration in 1917 until the establishment of the Jewish state Israel in 1948.

The text of my statement follows:

A STATEMENT BY THE HONORABLE SOL BLOOM ON HIS EFFORTS IN BEHALF OF PALESTINE

Palestine and the love of Zion were traditionally a part of the life and thinking of my family. It was natural and logical that it be so because of our deep attachment to the religion and faith of our people. My parents were orthodox Jews. They were raised in the orthodox faith and adhered to that faith throughout their lives. From my earliest childhood, which goes back more than 70 years, I recall having repeated with them the age-old prayer "L'shono Habo B'Yerusholayim" (next year in Jerusalem).

To us, both parents and children, Jerusalem was not a mere abstract figure of speech or something out of this world, something unreal. It was very real, indeed, very much a part of our existence. Jerusalem was a great dream and a great hope of something that was sure to come, sure to be realized; it was an unshakable belief in the ways of God and in eternal justice for the Jewish people who have waited patiently for 2,000 years for this dream to come true.

But unlike many others who were contented with merely dreaming and hoping for the restoration of Zion and the Holy City of Jerusalem, we did something about it in our own small way. In our house there was always the Zion charity box, hanging in a conspicuous and easily accessible place in the kitchen. Into it Mother would often throw a spare coin, particularly on Friday evenings just before the lighting of the Sabbath candles. This money would subsequently be used for the support of poor religious scholars and religious institutions in the Holy Land.

This affection for the religious institutions of our people in Palestine and the responsibility to aid in their maintenance was later inherited from our parents by their children. For many decades, after our parents had gone to the Great Beyond, we transmitted regularly sums of money directly to these institutions in Palestine. Among these were the great Bicur Cholim Hospital in Jerusalem, which had been founded about a century ago by the noted Jewish philanthropist Sir Moses Montefiore; the famous Yeshivath Etz-Chaim, with its hundreds of rabbinical students and scholars; the various Talmud Torah schools offering an elementary education to the young; the orphanages, the kitchens for the poor, etc.

It was my sister Ethel who, until her death in New York several years ago, had the responsibility of sending the family contributions at regular intervals to the institutions in the Holy Land. A letter addressed to her in March 1936 speaks for itself. It was written by Mr. J. M. Richman, the general secretary of the United Charity Institutions in Jerusalem (which incorporates most of the religious charitable institutions in the Holy City) and reads, in part, as follows:

"UNITED CHARITY INSTITUTIONS OF JERUSALEM,
"Jerusalem, March 26, 1936.

"Miss ETHEL BLOOM,
"New York City.

"DEAR FRIEND: We beg to acknowledge with many thanks the receipt of your very kind favor of last month. In reply to your question we beg to inform you that your dear late mother started sending money to our holy institutions as far back as 1894, so that it is over 40 years that your worthy family is continually supporting our institutions.

"As to your question if there are many names on our records who have been sending longer than you have, we beg to draw your attention to the fact that our institutions exist in the holy city of Jerusalem for nearly a whole century; and it is thus only natural that they should have many members who have supported our institutions, they and their children and their children's children, practically for generations. Your family, however, is among the distinguished few who not only supported these institutions with their own liberal donations but did also their best always to make other people interested in their holy and noble work as well. You probably know that not only your late righteous mother did her best for our institutions, but so did also your late noble father; and it is no doubt a great pleasure to both your dear father and mother's souls in Paradise to know they had left someone to continue their human and noble work in the holy city of Jerusalem. May the Lord enable you always to do as much good as is your own holy wish and desire, and as is undoubtedly the desire of your beloved late parents."

These philanthropies are continued to this day. For many years now I have been a member of the board of directors and sponsors of several of these institutions affiliated with the United Charity Institutions of Jerusalem. On June 10, 1948, the friends and officers of the Bicur Cholim Hospital in this country honored me at a testimonial dinner in New York on the occasion of my 25 years of service in Congress and my active association with the institutions for the past 15 years. At that time it was announced that the hospital is planning to erect a new wing to be called the Sol Bloom Wing.

So much for the philanthropic relationship with Palestine. There is also another phase of my work in behalf of Palestine of which I am no less proud, namely, my political representations and interventions during the past three decades in which we witnessed the rise of modern Palestine and the creation of the Jewish state of Israel. The Balfour Declaration of November 2, 1917, with its promise of a national home for the Jewish people in Palestine, truly electrified Jews the world over in that closing period of the First World War. Little did I dream in those days of rejoicing together with all of Israel that within a few short years I would be a Member of Congress and participate actively in many of the events which culminated in the establishment of Israel and its recognition by the United States.

My earliest efforts in Congress in the matter of Palestine date back to the year 1923, almost from the very first days of my entry into Congress. Earlier, in 1920, the Allied Conference of San Remo granted to Great Britain the mandate over Palestine. Two years later Congress took initial action on the Palestine question when it approved the so-called Fish-Lodge Resolution of 1922, which stated that the United States "favors the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people." During the ensuing 2 years, the United States and Great Britain worked out the details of a treaty concerning the rights of the two Governments and their nationals with reference to Palestine, which was signed at London on December 3, 1924, and is therefore sometimes referred to as "The Convention of 1924." Congress ratified that treaty early in 1925, but in the months before we had to do a good deal of talking and arguing with our colleagues in Congress to convince them that it was a just cause and in the interests of this country.

To me the Convention of 1924 was an important milestone in American-Palestine relations, because some 15 years later it helped to bring this country actively into the international effort for a solution of the Palestine problem and subsequent consideration of the problem by the United Nations. The most important point of that Convention was article 7, which reads:

"Nothing contained in the present convention shall be affected by any modification which may be made in the terms of the mandate, as recited above, unless such modification shall have been assented to by the United States."

In May 1939 the British Government instituted its famous White Paper policy limiting Jewish immigration to Palestine to 75,000 over a period of 5 years ending March 31, 1944, after which no further Jewish immigration was to be permitted "unless the Arabs of Palestine are prepared to acquiesce in it." There was world-wide resentment and anger against this policy and, as I reflect over that period, it becomes clear that that fateful decision on the part of Britain was the beginning of her miserable failure in the Near East and her eventual undoing in Palestine.

Several days after that policy was enunciated by the British Government, we succeeded in obtaining a majority of the members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives to sign a declaration protesting that Britain's action was not in accordance with the Convention of 1924 because the United States was not consulted. The first paragraph of that declaration reads:

"We, the undersigned members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, desire to call to the attention of the House and the State Department a declaration of the British Government announced last Wednesday, May 17, which is a clear repudiation of the convention between the United States and Great Britain with respect to Palestine, dated December 3, 1924."

I was already chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee then and my name, therefore, appears first on that protest declaration.

Four years later, in April 1943, came the Bermuda Conference, which brought together British and American representatives in an effort to work out a program of international action to solve the refugee problem. I was one of the three American delegates, appointed by the late President Franklin D. Roosevelt. I shall not go into details at this point about the Bermuda Conference and its failures and accomplishments, but merely wish to relate one phase of that effort as it concerned Palestine.

At the time of the Bermuda Conference, the British White Paper policy had once more year to go before Jewish immigration to Palestine would have been completely cut off, but by then only a little more than half of the 75,000 Jews permitted to enter under the terms of the White Paper had been able to reach Palestine because of wartime conditions. As a result of action which I initiated at Bermuda in 1943, the expiration date of March 31, 1944, was indefinitely postponed by the British Parliament to enable the remainder of approximately 30,000 Jews to enter Palestine whenever they reached that haven. Thus, the Palestine Jewish population is today greater by some 30,000 people because of my effort.

As the British White Paper policy was rapidly approaching the end of its 5-year period, the Jews of Palestine and other countries were becoming restless and alarmed about Britain's attitude and plans for the future. The demand for Britain's complete withdrawal from Palestine and the establishment there of a Jewish commonwealth became stronger. Finally, on January 27, 1944, Representative James A. Wright, a Democrat from Pennsylvania, and Representative Ranulf Compton, a Republican from Connecticut, introduced similar resolutions that the United States take appropriate measures to the end that a Jewish commonwealth be established in Palestine.

The resolutions were referred to the Foreign Affairs Committee and without much loss of time I called for hearings by the committee on February 8 and 9, 1944 (later also continued on February 15 and 16). During this brief space of time I prepared a compilation of historical documents dealing with the Palestine problem in a booklet of about 100 pages, entitled "The Jewish National Home in Palestine." In it were included such documents as the Palestine mandate, the 1924 Convention, the British White Paper, remarks by leading British statesmen opposing the White Paper policy, the views of the Jewish Agency for Palestine, etc.

These hearings aroused much interest and comment in the press and American public affairs and contributed vastly to the education of American public opinion on the question of Palestine. Furthermore, they paved the way for approval of the so-called Palestine Resolution by both Houses of Congress which finally came in December 1945, shortly after the war ended. Many letters of appreciation came to me after the hearings had been concluded. One of these, written by Dr. Abba Hillel Silver, the noted American Zionist leader who was himself a witness at the hearings, was written only 3 days after the conclusion of the hearings (February 19, 1944) and reads as follows:

"I have just returned home and I regard it as my first pleasant duty to write to you and tell you how grateful I and my friends are to you for the superb manner in which you conducted the historic hearings on the Palestine resolution. No one who attended those hearings could fail to be impressed by your unfailing fairness, courtesy, and good humor. I know that some of the opinions, which were expressed by some of the witnesses were distinctly distasteful to you, nevertheless you gave each one his day in court. Friend and foe alike of the resolution departed with a sense of having been given a square deal at your hands. You brought high honor to your distinguished office and you reflected credit upon your people."

The next event where I came face to face with the Palestine problem was during the San Francisco Conference of the United Nations in the spring of 1945. The Palestine question came up there rather indirectly, not before the conference as a whole, but in the committee on trusteeship of which I was a member. There we succeeded in inserting what became known later as Article 80 of the United Nations Charter in which the rights of the Jewish community in Palestine were safeguarded. That article states that "nothing in this chapter should be construed in and of itself to alter in any manner the rights of any state or any peoples or the terms of existing international instruments to which member states may respectively be parties." This means that the rights of Jews in and to Palestine, as stated in the Balfour Declaration and the League of Nations' mandate, would be protected.

The significance of this article may further be seen in the following way: While the proposal to safeguard Jewish rights in Palestine is in itself no advancement of the Zionist cause, it nevertheless served as a guaranty against further whittling away of that cause which Britain and the Arab states have sought for the past decade since the White Paper policy was instituted. Article 80, it would seem, makes illegal the White Paper because it is contrary to the mandate which specifically guarantees Jewish immigration into Palestine.

The course of the Palestine problem during the past year or two is too well known for a detailed account here. After the United Nations Committee on Palestine (UNSCOP) recommended partition of the Holy Land and the establishment of a Jewish state I spared neither time nor effort to talk with leading Americans in the administration and in Congress on the need for supporting that recommendation, which was finally announced by Herschel Johnson, the American delegate to the UN General Assembly, on October 11, 1947. This effort was then followed up by another effort to obtain the support of a sufficient number of other countries for the necessary two-thirds majority for approval. In my own humble way I approached the representatives of several countries, including the Philippines, Haiti, Liberia, and others, and in most instances I was successful in obtaining their support, and in one or two cases their abstention rather than casting a negative vote.

Finally, there is my intercession with President Truman for the recognition of the state of Israel. Two days before the actual creation of the Jewish state I had a personal talk with President Truman, and later sent a lengthy telegram to the President, urging him to extend immediate recognition and outlining to him my reasons why this step should be taken and why the United States should be the first country to recognize Israel. When the Jewish state was only a few minutes old President Truman extended de facto recognition to it, thus becoming the first country in the world to recognize an existing Jewish state in 2,000 years. My greatest moment of delight was on the evening of May 14, 1948, in front of the Jewish Agency building in Washington, when the flag of Israel was raised at the exact moment the Jewish state was born officially in Palestine, in this way realizing a 2,000-year-old dream.

The struggle for Israel is not over. The infant Jewish state in Palestine is still experiencing a precarious existence hanging in the balance between war and peace. There is still much that the United States, with its great international prestige and influence, could do to assure the existence of Israel as a state and to help bring peace to its war-tormented people and to all the people of the Near East. Our country can be helpful in the following ways:

1. Extend de jure or full recognition to the Jewish state of Israel.

2. Grant a loan of $100,000,000 to Israel to aid in the resettlement of displaced persons, in the reconstruction of war-devastated areas and in bolstering the economy of the country.

3. Sponsor and support Israel's admission to the United Nations as an equal member of the family of nations.

4. Remove the embargo on arms shipments because its further continuance places the United States in the unneutral position of indirectly supporting the Arabs.

5. End Arab aggression and obtain the withdrawal of foreign Arab troops from the Holy Land whose presence there is threatening the prestige of the United Nations and the peace of the world.

6. Finally, the United States must be on the alert at all times that the Marshall Plan funds advanced to Britain and surplus United States military equipment which remained in British hands should not be diverted to Arab countries for possible use against Israel now or in the future.

This is my program and my outline for continued efforts in behalf of Palestine in the months ahead. This is what I shall continue to fight for in the next Congress.

The Nomination of Thomas C. Buchanan to the Federal Power Commission

OF
HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement by me and an editorial from the Pittsburgh Press on the nomination of Thomas C. Buchanan to the Federal Power Commission.

There being no objection, the statement and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS, OF PENNSYLVANIA, ON THE NOMINATION OF THOMAS C. BUCHANAN TO THE FEDERAL POWER COMMISSION

A sidelight, but a very important one, of the battle in the Senate in the Eightieth Congress over amendment of the Natural Gas Act to provide greater profits and higher rates to the natural gas pipe-line companies, was the refusal of the Republican-controlled Senate to confirm the nomination of Thomas C. Buchanan, of Beaver, Pa., to the Federal Power Commission.

The action, or lack of action, in this instance, was closely allied with the fight over the Rizley bill.

Mr. Buchanan, an outstanding and public-spirited expert on utility matters, served with distinction for about 10 years on the public utility regulatory agency of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. He won an enviable reputation as a guardian of the public interest in that position. When he left the Pennsylvania commission at the expiration of his term a few years ago, he resumed a profitable law career.

He did not come forward and ask for a berth on the Federal Power Commission.

The position meant a personal financial sacrifice. However, he was thrust into this nomination by the urgent need for a qualified man on this commission who knew the subject of utility regulation thoroughly, who was devoted to the public interest, and who could fill a vacancy in the 5-man commission and thus permit the Commission to operate. Prior to his appointment, the Commission was divided two-to-two on some fundamental aspects of utility regulation.

Mr. Buchanan patriotically agreed to take the position. He was nominated by President Truman, but the nomination never got through the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The hearings on that nomination developed the unmistakable fact that the opponents to his confirmation believed the position should be filled by someone who shared the utility point of view on utility regulation, who would be amenable to the imposition by Commission order of regulatory practices proposed in the discredited Rizley natural gas bill. These were unmistakable factors behind the opposition to the confirmation.

However, the reasons usually advanced for opposing the nomination were that Mr. Buchanan lacked "judicial temperament" or was "consumer conscious" and was, perhaps, in some way, "socialistic."

The nomination was shuffled about in the committee and before a subcommittee until the very end of the session when it became obvious that the Republican leadership of the Senate would no longer agree to confirm any presidential appointee. Mr. Buchanan is now serving on an interim basis. He has been treated most unfairly, I believe.

Here is what the Pittsburgh Press has said about this case:

"THE BUCHANAN CASE

"Several weeks ago President Truman appointed Thomas C. Buchanan, of Beaver, to the Federal Power Commission.

"Mr. Buchanan was recommended for this appointed by United States Senator FRANCIS J. MYERS and Mayor Lawrence on the basis of his experience on the Pennsylvania Public Utility Commission.

"The Beaver lawyer also was one of the receivers in the famous Pittsburgh, Shawmut & Northern Railroad bankruptcy case. He got a nice fee for this service, but he and his partner did a good job, after the bankrupt firm had been bled and bled for many years.

"Mr. Buchanan's appointment to the Power Commission, which he did not solicit, immediately was the signal for some of the pettiest snide politics seen even in Washington in a long time.

"Instead of delving into the serious merits of the appointment, the Republican-controlled Senate Commerce Committee listened to a lot of prejudiced witnesses whose charges against Mr. Buchanan were trivial, frivolous, and disgustingly obscure.

"They even tried to make out a case to show that he had socialistic ideas, and threw out clumsy innuendo to the effect that he might even be a Communist.

"Whatever faults Mr. Buchanan may have, he never could be accused of flirting with any such philosophies.

"Not since the Howard Hughes investigation has a Senate committee made such an ass of itself."

Address of Hon. Franklin H. Lichtenwalter, of Pennsylvania

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. F. H. LICHTENWALTER
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. LICHTENWALTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address made by me to the Independent Merchant Exporters Association in New York City, Thursday, August 5:

Trading is one of the world's oldest avocations. This ancient and honorable calling has contributed immeasurably to the comforts, the security, and the welfare of countless millions of people in all parts of the globe. Trade has led to the diffusion of knowledge, the advancement of science, and the spread of civilization.

The earliest traders of recorded history were known as merchants, and they had their agents and brokers.

In the oldest written law—the Code of Hammurabi, an ancient Babylonian ruler who held sway prior to the year 2000 B. C.—was laid down some of the fundamental principles which guide our trade today.

Section 104 of the code provided:

"If a merchant give an agent, corn, wool, oil, or any other goods to transport, the agent shall give a receipt for the amount, and compensate the merchant therefor. Then he shall receive a receipt from the merchant for the money that he gives the merchant."

Business today is done upon much the same order. The manufacturer ships his goods on order. The agent or the broker gives the manufacturer a receipt for delivery. The manufacturer, as the merchant, bills the agent or broker. The broker pays the bill by check usually and his canceled check is the receipt.

Down through the centuries the romance of trade is interwoven into history. Did not Marco Polo seek the riches of the Far East in his travels? Was it not the desire for riches and trade which stimulated Christopher Columbus to search for the fabulous wealth of the Indies? Who can forget that the Dutch traders bought Manhattan for $20 and a few trinkets.

All history recalls that civilization follows the trade. Along with civilization trails the laws which mankind has evolved to cover the rights of person and property and trade. These laws are not static, but subject to change as necessity demands.

It was once believed that the world in general could achieve greater happiness and greater prosperity with no restraint whatsoever upon trade. There was an era of free trading, but it did not last long.

There soon came a time when trade of a competitive character came under the direct control of the sovereign. Parties were chartered to trade here, there, and everywhere. These chartered parties were given free hand to explore and exploit, in the name of the sovereign. Here in old Nieuw Amsterdam, one of the side lines urged upon the merchant traders was the dealing in Negro slaves, which was held to be more lucrative than the quest for furs.

The charters issued to the early enterprisers, such as the East India Co., the West India Co., the Hudson's Bay Co., and others, were the forerunners of our present licensing systems, wherein the state steps in and tells the trader what he can or cannot buy to sell. By the enactment of regulatory laws, the state for all practical purposes regulates what the citizen can buy through the application of import duties and excise taxes.

When the Thirteen Original Colonies, operating under the Articles of Confederation, decided to adopt a constitution for the purpose of forming a more perfect union, establishing justice, and promoting the domestic tranquillity, they wrote into that document the basis for Federal participation by delegating to the Congress the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes."

This provision, together with the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises gives the Federal Government the final say-so in all trade, domestic and foreign.

To control our interstate trade, the Congress has set up the Federal Trade Commission and the Interstate Commerce Commission.

To regulate our foreign trade the Congress has enacted various tariff acts, and by the act of April 10, 1918, the Congress projected the Federal Trade Commission into foreign commerce when they required that every association which engages solely in export trade, within 30 days after its creation, shall file with the Federal Trade Commission a verified written statement setting forth the location of its offices or places of business and the names and addresses of all its officers and of all its stockholders or members, and if a corporation, a copy of its certificate or articles of incorporation and bylaws, and if unincorporated, a copy of its articles or contract of association, and on the 1st day of January of each year every association engaged solely in export trade shall make and file a like statement and of all amendments to or changes in the charter, articles of incorporation, bylaws, etc.

The Federal Trade Commission is further empowered by this same act to inquire into the business methods and financial operations of any company or association engaged in foreign trade.

Now this may seem strange to those who see no need for all this so-called red tape and Government interference with the export trade.

But business brought about this type of legislation by restrictive and monopolistic practices which are the very antithesis of the goals which thinking Americans are striving to attain, namely:

The active promotion of foreign trade and participation in foreign business, subject only to such limitations as the national defense and the national economy may require and which are necessary to promote the general welfare and make more secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity.

When the Republic was established the founding fathers, while keenly alert to all the injustices the former colonists had suffered, were fearful that here in the the new Nation, differences might arise between one State and another which would be repugnant to the ideas of a competitive economy. Hence they delegated to the Congress the power to coin money and regulate the value thereof and they further specified that no tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State, and no State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports except which may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws.

Trade within the United States, therefore, enjoys an amount of flexibility that is limited only by the statutes prohibiting monopolies and combinations in restraint of trade. In the field of foreign trade the situation is entirely different.

The American trader besides having to contend with the statutes of this country runs right smack into the legislative and commercial practices of other nations, some of which have almost unlimited state control.

CARTELS

Many of the European nations encourage cartel trade. Ten of the nations that we are aiding under the European recovery program look very kindly upon cartels.

In Belgium, Holland, Italy, and Switzerland compulsory cartels were or still are authorized by law.

In England, France, and the Netherlands East Indies compulsory cartelization was required in specified industries.

Denmark, Norway, and Sweden have special cartel commissions. In England, France, and the Netherlands East Indies cartels can operate without any supervisory legislation.

Denmark, Holland, Norway, Sweden, and Switzerland strictly supervise the operation of their cartels, and in Denmark, Holland, Norway, and Switzerland all cartel agreements must be registered with the Government which agrees to protect trade secrets.

The operations of the cartels in certain European nations are strengthened by import and exchange controls which make competition as we know it here highly impracticable.

Our own lawmakers have tried to encourage foreign trade for years. Through the medium of reciprocal trade agreements, loans from the Export-Import Bank, credits for the purchase of surplus property from the War Assets Administration and the Office of Foreign Liquidation Commissioner, grants in aid under United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration, and many other ways.

However, when the Congress enacted Public Law 395 last December 30, the Congress conferred upon the President of the United States the most unusual authority to use "price criteria" in the licensing of exports, either by giving preference among otherwise comparable applications to those which provide the lowest prices, or in exceptional circumstances, by fixing reasonable mark-ups in export prices over domestic prices.

When the application of this section of Public Law 395 was announced by the Office of International Trade in the Department of Commerce, the Small Business Committee of the House was almost immediately besieged with calls from exporters who had been caught in the middle of bona fide transactions demanding some form of relief.

The apparent injustice of the situation, that is ex post facto application of this new authority to deals then pending between American exporters and their clients or customers, caused the Honorable WALTER C. PLOESER to immediately schedule hearings on the matter, and he simultaneously introduced a bill in the House of Representatives (H. R. 5470) repealing that section of Public Law 395 dealing with price criteria. Within the space of only 3 weeks this bill which was referred to the Banking and Currency Committee had cleared the Rules Committee and was passed by the House of Representatives. However, the bill never was passed by the Senate, so we have price criteria still with us as an instrument of those who seek to take the profit out of our foreign trade or restrict it to narrow limits. However, the OIT in acknowledgment of the thinking of Congress, and because of a mass of protests did correct the situation on May 18, by their Export Bulletin 457 in which they said, "The provision of section 3 (b) of Public Law 395 (80th Cong.) regarding price will be applied as one of the licensing criteria only when the export price for the specific commodity is obviously excessive. Commodity advisory panels or commodity advisory committees will be consulted whenever possible in determining what constitutes obviously excessive prices.

The new bulletin makes it clear that export licenses will not be denied because the prices shown on license applications are slightly higher than those quoted on otherwise comparable applications.

Our committee will continue to be on the alert against unfairness to our exporters because in protecting them we protect genuine trade with other countries. We object to Government agencies such as Commodity Credit, War Surplus, Agriculture, and Treasury furnishing commodities to foreign governments under ECA. We feel that the businessmen of the United States who are traditional traders, should be permitted to carry on their business free of Government competition.

Our committee stands ever ready to correct inequities which inflict hardship on free enterprise. When we fail in that endeavor, then our existence as a committee will be subject to early termination.

HOW BIG IS OUR FOREIGN TRADE?

As our country improved its industrial techniques and its manufacturing processes, American goods came to be known the world over for their qualities and perfection. It was but natural that foreign trade would grow regardless of the competition expected from the highly industrialized countries of Europe.

From 1930 to 1947, during the early days of the depression and down through the period of preparation and participation in World War II, our exports totaled $103,369,352,000 while imports were $52,937,976,000, leaving a trade balance in favor of our country amounting to more than $50,000,000,000.

This looks like a very healthy situation. But is it?

More than thirty-three billion of our favorable trade balances was created from 1941 to 1946 under lend-lease program.

Another two billion six hundred and sixty million can be chalked up as our contribution to UNNRA and the balance to other enterprises which have drained off over $55,000,000,000 in goods and services from the United States, and which today make up a large portion of the tax burden we all are called upon to shoulder.

So much for our foreign trade.

Now I wish that it were in my province to give you a word of encouragement and good cheer at this time. But frankly, I must confess that the outlook is not too good. The time is rapidly approaching when our Government will either have to forego its charitable enterprises in foreign lands, and look after our own domestic economy, or we face serious repercussions here at home. The American people are dissatisfied with programs that drain away their earnings, create shortages and increase the cost of living.

We are pledged to help certain of the European nations get back on their feet, but we are pledged to no more than this. We cannot afford a continuing world-wide relief program and your representatives in the Congress know this full well.

For the future, exporters may expect to do business along narrowly defined channels. We will be able to export this year from our surpluses, according to committee figures and data, the following supplies:

1. Three hundred and thirty million pounds of fats and oils out of 5,870,000,000 pounds needed by the Marshall-plan countries.

2. Two million four hundred thousand bales of raw cotton out of 6,057,000 bales needed.

3. Six million five hundred and seventy thousand metric tons of bread and coarse grains out of 23,228,000 metric tons needed.

4. One hundred and thirty-five million pounds of cheese out of 500,400,000 pounds needed.

5. Fifteen thousand metric tons or 33,060,000 pounds of meat out of 2,243,000 metric tons needed.

6. Three hundred and twenty million pounds of dried whole milk out of 688,000,000 pounds needed.

7. Twenty-five million metric tons of coal of a possible 50,000,000 metric tons required.

8. Twenty thousand quintals of leather out of 200,000 quintals required.

We have plenty of drugs and pharmaceuticals for export.

We will also have limited quantities of rice and lumber for export.

With respect to steel, although we exported more than 6,500,000 tons of steel and steel-mill products last year, the demands of our own economy are growing so rapidly that not over 4,000,000 tons will be available for export during 1948, and even that quantity pinches small business at many points.

We have tobacco in abundance, raisins by the tons and can supply all the export requirements of these commodities.

And now we come down to coal. We have been carrying coals to Newcastle for quite some time, and will probably continue to do so until the coal miners of Wales, the Saar, and of Poland are provided with new and better equipment with which to increase their production.

So while the coal-export business may remain good, the prospects for coal-mining machinery for export also seem excellent.

Besides the items mentioned there are thousands of small manufactured articles like hand tools, etc., which exporters will be called upon to furnish. It is this small business, the nuisance end, if you please, which calls for much attention with small chances of profit.

You gentlemen of the trading fraternity are to be congratulated upon the fortitude with which you have measured up to your responsibilities as businessmen and as Americans. I hope that at some not too far distant day the world will again arrive at that normalcy for which we all yearn and that you may each and every one then enjoy the full fruits of your labors in the fields of foreign trade.

Old-Age Assistance

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. WILLIAM LEMKE

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. LEMKE. Mr. Speaker, the high cost of living and of housing has caused more suffering among the old people, whose livelihood depends upon social security, than among any other class. These are no longer able to make their own living. Their industrial and productive period is in the past.

While the cost of living and housing has more than tripled on an average, the amounts of the grants for the aged have remained about the same. These range from $14 to $37 in the average case, depending upon the State's contribution. While the last Congress gave a small increase, it is not, however, in keeping with the increased cost of living.

The trouble with social security is that those who favor it are divided into too many different camps. One group wants this and another group wants that. The majority of the Members of Congress know and feel that the present grants are altogether insufficient. If all the factions would get together and work definitely for one bill or one plan, then they could achieve reasonable results.

While the Truman administration is making loans and gifts to inefficient, and in some cases, grafting foreign governments, it has woefully neglected the old people. They are among the forgotten people. While the administration is feeding some able-bodied foreigners, too lazy to work, it has permitted the aged to go hungry, and in some cases ill-clad and ill-housed. It has been, and is, "foreigners preferred, Americans forgotten."

It is time that Congress and the President realize that our old people created the wealth that the President is so lavishly giving away to other nations. It is time for us all to realize that it was the pioneering spirit and hardships of these people that made the foreign gifts and loans possible.

We all know that what little old-age assistance we have is the result of the Townsend movement. But for this movement, the aged would at present be given very little, if any, consideration. It was this movement that made the Nation conscious of its duty to the people who created its wealth—to the people who created the wealth with which we won World Wars I and II. It was this movement that awakened and quickened our conscience to the responsibility and the duty the Nation owes to its elderly people.

During the special session of Congress a large group of Members met and urged an increase in grants to the aged. These Members insisted that the existing old-age assistance was not sufficient in many cases to keep body and soul together. They felt it did not afford security. They realized that it does not give freedom from want or freedom from fear of insecurity. They felt that the special session of Congress should increase these grants to not less than $60 a month as immediate relief. This $60 to be made free from the usual red tape.

Under the present Federal law, the State must match dollar for dollar the amount paid to the aged by the Federal Government. All States required the aged to assign their homes or other property or interests they have to the State welfare board in order to get assistance, and the Federal Government demands one-half of the amount recovered from this source.

In short, the present old-age assistance law is not a home preserver, but a home wrecker. The Federal Government joins hands with the States that require the assignment of the home, and in many cases takes the home from the children after the parents pass on. This practice should be condemned. It is inhuman, cruel, and brutal. A nation's strength depends upon its home owners. We need more, not less, home owners.

The Federal and State Governments demand proof that the persons applying for assistance have no relatives or friends who will take care of them. In other words, they must prove that they are paupers before they can get relief. Such humiliating and shameful red tape should be cut out. The truth is that we require more proof of the inability of our aged to support themselves than we do of foreigners. This procedure is too niggardly and too un-American. It must not be continued.

I repeat that under the present Old-Age Assistance Act, in some cases the State and Federal Governments pay as little as $14 per month to aged individuals without any other income. Surely now that the purchasing power of our dollar is worth only 39 cents as compared with the purchasing power of the 100-cent dollar of 1937 and 1939, we all realize that no one can, in any part of the country, live on the American standard on $14 a month.

Personally, I feel that the phrase "old-age pension" — old-age assistance — should be changed to "old-age compensation." We know that every person who has worked at a useful occupation from the age of 18 to the age of 60 has created enough new wealth to last for the rest of his lifetime. It matters not what kind of work such a person performed. It makes no difference whether such work was agricultural, educational, industrial, or professional, or whether it was in raising a family. The public got the benefit.

We also have with us those who are totally physically disabled. These are unable to make a living at any stage of life. They must be taken care of by the public. The best and cheapest way to take care of these, unless they are mental cases or living in a penal institution, is direct assistance. Their disability is not voluntary. It is not their fault. They are in a world where human instinct tells us that they should be taken care of and life made secure and pleasant as far as possible.

Congress has already made a study and survey of this whole subject. It knows that the care of the aged is a Federal responsibility. The Government, as a whole, must become interested in the physical well-being of all its citizens. When that happens, then we need not fear communism. Then we need not fear fascism or nazism. These "isms" all come from poverty. Poverty and misery are the seed beds in which communism prospers and grows.

Let us give to the aged sufficient compensation for their past labor so that their sons and daughters, brothers and sisters will be glad to take care of them. When that is done, there will be no room for communism or fascism. Love of country and love of Government will be spontaneous. The machinery to compensate the aged must be made more simple. There must not be weeks of delay, or red tape without end, or a waste of time and money in compensating the aged for past services.

If our form of government is to continue as a republic, then it must keep abreast of civilization. If we are to avoid communism, fascism, or nazism, then we must take a greater interest in all of our citizens. We must assure to the aged freedom from fear. We must assure to all our people future security—freedom from want. We must remember that those who created the wealth of this Nation are entitled to at least some return when they reach the age of inability—as a rule at the age of 60.

If our Government can give $40,000,000,000, since the war, to foreign nations—even billions to liquidators of other nations' people—then it is time that we take care of our aged, who created the wealth which our administration so lavishly distributes to other countries.

I hope that the group that met during the special session will meet again at the opening of the Eighty-first Congress. I hope that with them will be the leaders of the various groups who favor an intelligent old-age compensation, and that together we may accomplish the result that long ago should have been accomplished—that is, get an intelligent old-age compensation law enacted.

False Prophets and Prices

OF

HON. JOHN D. DINGELL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, we are indebted to Drew Pearson for having delved into the realm of the not too distant past to unearth and revive statements of "very important people" whose faces must now be red. These statements concerning OPA are, of course, ineradicable and of record. They were frequently made before their own conventions or before congressional committees and disseminated for public consumption by the press throughout the country. They might have been forgotten temporarily but now that they are brought to mind we wonder whether they were made by fools or false prophets—by rascals or honest men. One thing we do know is that they were wrong, dead wrong, and with the result that the great mass of our people have been victimized for the benefit of a relatively few who stood to profit by the death of OPA.

They were, of course, not made by prophets, but by self-professed experts and industrial leaders. They are supposed to be authoritative to the extent that Congress was expected to pay heed to these gratuitous, and in those cited instances, specious, if not dishonest expressions. The irresponsible and far-fetched reflections of selfish interests can be and have always been made with impunity. Today Congress is held to blame, or at least those who voted to kill or make impotent OPA, for having followed the wrong advice. Those who appeared as experts, leaders, or advisers disappeared into the dim forgotten past. No one remembers their names or the capacity in which they appeared until they are uncovered by the prowling experts of the press, like Drew Pearson. Here are a few specimens of misrepresentation. Some are better than others but all can be classed as gems. Here is a juicy one by Wesley Hardenberg, president of the American Meat Institute, which today offers little consolation for the high prices of meats:

> What is needed is for Congress to do away entirely with all OPA meat and livestock price regulations of every description so that consumers again may get the kind of meat they want, when they want it, at a fair competitive market.

If John E. Jaeger, president, National Association of Retail Grocers, knew as little about groceries as he did about OPA and the future, by now he most likely should be out of the grocery business. Read what he had to say:

> We [retail grocers] feel that the time has arrived when * * * action must be taken * * * to prevent renewal of the Price Control Act. Competition will benefit the consumer by making available ample food at reasonable prices.

Arthur Bruce, president, National Lumber Manufacturers Association, in view of high prices and housing shortages, not only goes out on the limb but actually cuts himself down. Read what he had to say prior to June 30 of 1946:

> I am personally of the opinion that we would be better off if the Office of Price Administration were to die a natural death June 30.

The automobile-wise and price-conscious American people can get a good laugh out of the prophetic remarks of Robert R. Wason, president of the National Association of Manufacturers, even while paying through the nose.

> If OPA is finally dead, women * * * will now use the canned meats and other goods they have on their shelves to see them through any temporary period of price rises. If OPA is eliminated entirely, prices of automobiles may be expected to reach normal within 6 months, while rents might take at least a year.

Have you gotten your automobile yet? If so, at what price?

Here's another "unbiased opinion" by an expert, Al Guckenberger, executive secretary, New York State Food Merchants Association:

> Prices * * * will level off shortly as they had begun to do last August before controls were reimposed.

To cap the climax, read the temperate reference of Herbert U. Nelson, executive vice president of the National Association of Real Estate Boards, who through a most powerful and successful lobby were able to prevent enactment of effective housing legislation. Here is his opinion:

> We've got a gang in power who thinks solely of the consumer, and usually in terms of protecting him.

Where ignorance is bliss, it is folly to be wise. Silence in these cited instances might rightfully be golden.

A Free Economy, the Only Source of Ample Food and Shelter—Four Thousand Years of Failure of Price Control

OF

HON. RALPH W. GWINN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. GWINN of New York. Mr. Speaker, I want very briefly to give you a little sketch of 4,000 years of uninterrupted failure of price controls as applied in the experience of nations from the beginning of civilization. We have heard from time to time that our experience with price controls dates from Leon Henderson, or from 1942.

That American passion for economic freedom has deep roots in our history becomes clear when one reads the words of the president of Princeton, John Witherspoon, in a letter to George Washington:

> Fixing the prices of commodities has been attempted by law in several States among us, and it has increased the evil it was meant to remedy, as the same practice has done since the beginning of the world.

Is that really true? What does the historical experience of mankind teach about this fundamental issue, which touches the life of every man, woman, and child?

CONTROLS TRIED 4,000 YEARS AGO

The temptation for people in power to tamper with prices and production seems to be a very ancient human game. Thus, in the Laws of Hammurabi, King of Babylon—2285–2242 B. C.—we find wage controls for boatmen, reapers, threshers, shepherds, laborers, artisans, bricklayers, tillers, stone cutters, milkmen, and carpenters. Regulated also were builders' fees and warehousing, as well as rental of cows in milk, calves, oxen, wagons, and freight and passenger boats. On the basis of historical evidence, we know that ancient history, throughout the changing centuries, is characterized by a never-ending succession of popular upheavals against tyrannical rules and regulations imposed upon the people from above. This continued strife reveals one of the fundamental themes of human history—a struggle between regimentation and freedom.

We find later laws in ancient history, like, for example, the Hittite Code—1350 B. C.—which was discovered in Baghaz Koi in Asia Minor, that attempted to establish provision for wages and prices. The very fact that such laws had to be abolished or drastically revised under popular pressure indicates that even in ancient times rulers met with deep-seated resentment against their attempts to block the activities and trade of their citizens.

ROME HAD FREEDOM

History tells us that the Roman Republic, under a constitution guaranteeing freedom, became the envy of the "barbarians" of other countries. Its soldiers were increasingly victorious in their conflicts with the half-hearted mercenaries of neighboring nations that enjoyed little freedom. The glory that was Rome extended throughout what is now western Europe and northern Africa because Rome was the center of freedom. There were no planned economies. As Gibbon tells us, freedom, honor, and justice were universally recognized virtues. And the freedom of Rome extended to its colonies.

The recurrent famines of earlier days were experienced with less and less frequency. Rome gave the civilized world the highest standard of living then known to mankind. But what happened? The leaders reached out for power. The republic became an empire. At first the emperors were cautious. They talked freedom as they planned a police state. Gibbon says, "Augustus was sensible that mankind is governed by names; nor was he deceived in his expectation, that the senate and the people would submit to slavery, provided they were respectfully assured that they still enjoyed their ancient freedom. A feeble senate and enervated people cheerfully acquiesced in the pleasing illusion." And so the people were fooled by bread and circuses. They looked to the government to supply more and more of their needs. Production declined everywhere. Prices skyrocketed.

ROMAN CONTROLS FAILED MISERABLY

Emperor Diocletian decided to maintain his popularity with promises to fix prices and reduce the cost of living. So in A. D. 301, he issued an imperial edict fixing the prices of commodities for the whole Roman Empire. His grandiose scheme was ushered in with a fanfare of benevolent propaganda. In fact, in the preface to the edict, the Roman Emperor shows an insight into the laws of psychological propaganda technique which is as startling as it is up to date. He assures his people that the coming economical control system is built on the highest motives of making the whole nation participate "in the blessings of that peace for which we have laboriously striven." He continues that in order to make this price-fixing system work, it is necessary for the rulers like "watchful parents of the whole human race" to help the people with remedies from above, and that such measures have become necessary, since humanity cannot achieve such good results by its own free action.

The edict goes on to explain how the people have become greedy; how exorbitant profits were being made; how monopoly was running wild, and the people, therefore, needed protection from foes within as well as foes without. The only cure was a complete over-all control of food, clothing, wages, and so forth. Reading the list of commodities which the Emperor asked his Chester Bowles of that day, Maximianus, to take control of, reads astonishingly like our own modern OPA lists: Farm products, dyes, needles, feathers, filling for upholstery, seeds, wine, oil, meat, poultry, fats, sea food, building timber, wooden posts, finished wagons, agricultural implements, and so on ad infinitum.

In order to enforce his imperial law, Diocletian built up a huge bureaucracy to administer his universal price-control system. A contemporary observer has characterized the situation in the following words: "The number of ministers, of magistrates, of officers, and of servants who filled different departments of the state, multiplied beyond the example of former times."

The price-control police forces of Diocletian had as their legal weapon, severe penalties against any breach of the law. Death was the punishment for those who dared sell above maximum prices. Death also for the buyer who aided and abetted him. Death, too, for those who bought and sold illegal stocks. However, human nature being what it is, these penalties did not affect the general picture, and no bureaucratic machinery or legal apparatus could prevent a complete break-down of the law of supply and demand with all the economic and social evils resulting from it.

Economic historians of the Roman Empire find that a situation developed which was as tragic as it was prophetic. Because the scarcity of production was heightened by the interference from price-control laws, prices on consumers' goods in the actual market rose to catastrophic heights. The control system which was put into operation to combat inflation, in this manner actually created inflationary trends which broke the backbone of the economic life of a great empire. Everywhere the results soon became visible: Building and construction stopped entirely. The arts and sciences fell into decay to such an extent that modern historians can recognize immediately the crudity and purility of the craftsmanship of this period. Artistic creativeness and inventive skill did no longer thrive in this new atmosphere of economic tyranny.

History goes on to point out that while the economic waste was incredible the trades sank to ever lower levels. Poverty was created among the broad masses, while the merchants and small entrepreneurs were impoverished into bankruptcy. Landowners and manufacturers, who were the hardest hit, lost interest in a system of economic slave control that took away the private inventiveness and enterprise of the human genius.

In the realm of agriculture the situation became so bad that the Emperor found it necessary to order the farmers and the farm laborers controlled by serfdom under state supervision. That this measure could only lead to a worsening of the agricultural situation is perfectly explainable by the well-known historical law, that soil tilled by slave labor never yields abundant fruits such as land cultivated by free farmers.

To meet this general extremity of national economics, the Emperor, therefore, naturally turned to the device which is as common as it is artificial, namely, of exorbitant taxation. Taxes and surtaxes multiplied in a hopeless effort to fill an ever-empty treasury.

Thus ends the only total price-control system which the history of the Roman Empire records. Diocletian alone, of all the Roman emperors, was foolish enough to attempt it. If he had listened to the history of his empire he might have observed how earlier attempts of partial price fixing under emperors like Tiberius, Commodus, and Alexander Severus all had broken down. However, like many panic-stricken tyrants in the history of mankind, Diocletian apparently fancied that, if the price-control system only could be made totalitarian and foolproof, it would work where partial attempts have broken down. He lived to see the tragic mistake of his economic tyranny over a whole nation's life, since his experiment ended with such a complete failure that the edict had to be repealed as useless and unenforceable. Soon after the poverty-stricken and indignant people forced his abdication, on May 1 A. D. 305.

The more serious lesson of this Roman price-control experiment is grasped, however, only if one realizes that its long-range effect on the Roman Empire was directly connected with the economic destruction of the greatest empire of ancient history. As the historian, Jules Toutain, has pointed out, the economic break-down of the Roman Empire made it fall an easy prey to the attack of the barbarians who, a few generations later, poured in over the borders of the Empire south of the Danube and west of the Rhine. What had once been a proud and great nation had deteriorated into a mass of people which had lost both the productive initiative and the national self-esteem which make a people strong and healthy. One of the fundamental laws of national defense is that only a nation in which freedom has been preserved under law is able and willing to take up arms in defense of human rights and human dignity.

Upon the grave of the Roman Empire the well-known historian, Samuel Dill, of Oxford, has written the following epitaph, which we may do well to remember:

> The system of bureaucratic despotism, elaborated finally by Diocletian and Constantine, produced a tragedy in the truest sense, such as history has seldom exhibited: In which, by an inexorable fate the claims of fancied omnipotence ended in humiliating paralysis of administration; in which determined effort to remedy social evils only aggravated them until they became unendurable; in which the best intentions of the central power were, generation after generation, mocked and defeated alike by irresistible laws of human nature and by hopeless perfidy and corruption in the servants of government.

It is not surprising that kings, who were notorious for their excessive egotism, should be found in the list of rulers bent upon price control. There is Philip IV, of France, who, in 1306, antedated Hitler's Jewish pogroms by six centuries, and who created a dire scarcity of wheat, bread, and clothing throughout his nation by his price-control system.

There are English kings, like Henry III and George II, who tampered with prices of grain and bread until Parliament rose up in indignation and repealed these royal price-control attempts.

There was Edward II, who, on an island like England, hit upon the ridiculous scheme of safeguarding production level on sea food by a control system which was inaugurated as a benefit for the people, but actually turned out to be such an impossible flop that all fish disappeared from the markets in the British Isles.

FRENCH CONTROLS FAILED

A complete survey of ancient, medieval, and modern price-control systems proves that they created scarcity instead of production and ill-will instead of cooperation. One of the most illustrious and meaningful examples of this historical law we find as we turn to the history of the French Revolution.

When the leftists of that day—the Jacobins—decided to destroy French culture and French enterprise, they made use of the old tyrannical medium of a violent price control. Being experts in revolutionary technique, they chose to place iron control upon 39 necessities of life under the agency called committee of public safety.

The picture of what happened to the French revolutionary price-control system runs true to pattern.

As one historian, Andrew Dickson White, wrote in 1876:

> The first result of the maxium was that every means was taken to evade the fixed price imposed, and the farmers brought in as little produce as they possibly could. This increased the scarcity, and the people of the large cities were put on an allowance. Tickets were issued authorizing the bearer to obtain at the official prices a certain amount of bread or sugar or soap or wood or coal to cover immediate necessities.

As another historian reports this era:

> Prices were fixed. Any attempt to profiteer on necessities was made punishable by death. To break all opposition, the terror was established. The tribunal revolutionaire began sending scores of innocent people to the guillotine every day. Between March of 1793 and July of 1794 nearly 3,000 people were executed in Paris and about 15,000 in the provinces. At Nantes three or four thousand prisoners were thrust into old boats that were sunk in the middle of the river; at Lyon they were shot down in groups of as many as 200 at a time.
> The Civil War of the Vendee began in 1793. Insurrection against the revolutionary government spread into Poitou, Anjou, and Brittany. Threat of famine compelled the rationing of food. There was much discontent on that account. The Hebert group attempted to incite the famished people to an attack on the convention. Robespierre acted swiftly. Hebert and his chief lieutenants went to the guillotine. That was in March 1794.
> Robespierre, then 35, became the uncontested master of the situation. From April to July 1794, his authority was unchallenged. He moved rapidly toward his goal of complete social equality. It was ordered that the confiscated properties of enemies of the republic should be given to deserving patriots. Saint-Just was charged with this distribution, and was authorized to revise the code of social institutions in the interest of pure democracy * * * trial by jury was denied to those suspected of conspiracy and the tribunal was authorized to make condemnations without the hearing of witnesses. Heads began to fall faster than ever. It was the Great Terror. In 45 days there were 1,285 executions.
> The Great Terror was an expression of Robespierre's impatience to realize his ideal state. He wished to destroy all opposition to the establishment of social and economic equality. But he had overreached himself. The razor of the republic began to lose its popularity. The pitiless apostle of liberty, fraternity, and equality began to lose prestige. The word "tyrant" was murmured. * * * On July 28, 1794, Robespierre and his brother, Saint-Just, and 19 others were executed. That ended the terror, and it all but ended the republic. Democracy had followed autocracy to the guillotine. The death of Robespierre ended the dream of pure democracy and equality. No man dared to espouse the perilous cause that had brought death to its devotees. The Robespierre legislation in the interest of equality was either suppressed or ignored and, to the delight of the merchants, price control was abandoned.

All price fixers do not meet so violent an end as that of Robespierre but the wrath of the hungry and disillusioned people always descends upon them.

A sigh of relief and a new spirit of self-governed activities swept through France. The farmers plowed and planted, and during the month of July 1795 they could once again harvest their crops as free men after the disastrous and negative years of revolutionary price control. Liberty had conquered once more.

EARLY AMERICAN OPA'S

Coming now to the United States, we find the resistance to Government tampering with the laws of supply and demand greatest of all. A limited price control was attempted during the American Revolutionary War, but the alert and freedom-loving citizens, taught by experience, soon totally rejected this Government interference with the economic life of the States.

Led by Connecticut and Massachusetts, the New England States went in for regulating prices early in the Revolutionary War. This emergency measure was motivated quite as much by the fact that the Continental currency lost its monetary value as by the self-evident fact that British blockade created a severe shortage of consumers' goods. The inevitable result was that the 1774 price level soon broke down, and as early as the spring of 1777 Connecticut, Rhode Island, and New Hampshire were forced to raise the level for maximum prices. In Rhode Island, however, the town of Providence objected strenuously. It directed its representatives in the legislature to fight such measures, as they created scarcity and produced animosity.

In Connecticut, Governor Trumbull warned in a public statement:

> If we affix a low price to provisions and articles of importation we shall find that the farmer will cease to till the ground for more than is necessary for his own subsistence, and the merchant will not risk his fortune on a small and precarious prospect of gain.

The good Governor was really advocating what later generations prefer to call controlled inflation, even though he must be excused for not knowing the modern devices of economic deception called farm subsidies and cost-plus contracts.

Soon the States, including New York, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey, began to labor under keen misgivings, however, that the price control as such was a deceptive technique. This discovery led to an interstate convention being called in New Haven in January 1778. The war was still raging and the longed-for victory for independence still did seem far away. In a stampede of economic panic, the delegates voted, therefore, to adopt a price advance of 75 percent above the 1774 price level.

What was meant to be a radical cure threatened to become a disaster, since a run-away inflation soon began to encompass the national economic life. The Continental Congress very quickly realized that it had to reverse its policy in order to avert sure economic doom. In its meeting of April 8, 1778, it declared, therefore, to the sorely tried war-torn Nation:

> It hath been found by experience that limitation on the prices of commodities is not only ineffective for the purpose proposed, but likewise productive of very evil consequences to the great detriment of the public service and grievous oppression of individuals.

The courageous and wise pronouncement by the Continental Congress had a reassuring effect upon the States. In fact, so much so that price fixing was permitted to lapse for about a year. During this period, the American people discovered that price fixing could not serve as a safeguard against the heavy inflation which their just War of Independence gave them to carry as an additional price for freedom. They recognized this as an economic fact which proved that, measured in money values, they all were becoming poorer as together they were winning their freedom.

In 1779, the last brief attempt was made at price fixing as a remedy to control a deeply wounded war economy. On May 25, 1779, the town of Boston adopted a price schedule for 15 articles on a month-to-month basis. And in July of the same year, a State convention at Concord adopted a general price level, stipulating that "violators were to have their names published in the newspapers as enemies of the country." The background for this threat against violators was, of course, the fact that the very outcome of the whole war hung in the balance.

Yet, even so, history records that penalties were rarely imposed. Indeed, the laws were, for the most part, not enforced. They remained, as Prof. Allan Nevins has pointed out, on the statute books.

And as soon as the fortunes of war turned, the States rid themselves of the fruitless and scarcity-producing price-control system, which they had grasped in a moment of panic. It is to the undying glory of the men and women of the Revolutionary period that a whole year before Cornwallis surrendered at Yorktown, all the States had already repealed their price-control laws.

Such was the depth of their belief in freedom as a producer of goods and services. Price control in America was over—not again to be revived for 160 years.

They fought not merely for independence. They fought for freedom and learned right in the middle of war itself that freedom produces more food and clothing and shelter than controls can produce. They emancipated freedom from Europe and European controls.

During the postwar period, under the Articles of Confederation, our colonial ancestors lived in an era of high prices. The unsecured revolutionary currency was issued in such quantities that "not worth a continental" became a popular phrase. The monetary situation interfered seriously with trade and tended to foment discord, distrust, and disunity.

It was in this atmosphere that the Constitutional Convention met in 1787. It is worthy of note that no delegate to this Convention seriously proposed that our Government should have the power to fix prices. Their generation had learned that Government price fixing would not work and so this power was not listed among those delegated powers which the people gave their Federal Government.

To exercise such power now is sheer usurpation. It was the adoption of our Constitution with its limitation on control that brought the new era of food and shelter. We need to remind ourselves that this era started right here in America. Our example spread around the world until the world rejected freedom for many forms of collectivism. With that has come again the ghastly prospects of starvation and famine. That has been the rule of life throughout history except where for brief periods of time freedom of the people has been maintained.

This has always existed whenever land has been used in common and regulated by some central authority. The planned economies of lords, kings, and dictators have always resulted in famine and want.

Freedom, which is synonymous with ample food and shelter, is the first great achievement of modern times. Under the Constitution, Americans were free to own their lands, work out their own plans, and enjoy the fruits of their labor without regulations by authority or oppressive taxation. With this freedom has come agricultural science and invention of machinery, increased supplies of food, intellectual advance, improved means of communication, steam, electricity, and all the wonders that only the imaginative and creative minds and spirits of free men and women may comprehend for the future blessings of mankind.

Mr. Speaker, this debate has clarified one fundamental thing; namely, the fact that we are today witnessing the old, old fight between two contradictory political systems of government. On the one hand we have the advocates of government control over national life and national production. They willingly abandon freedom. To adopt price controls in peacetime would be clear proof that the European idea of government control and government domination and compulsion has moved permanently into the political philosophy and political life of this great Republic.

Those who do not believe that freedom will solve our economic problems should stop fooling themselves. They continue to talk about freedom, but they do not really believe in it. They give lip service to liberty, but the moment the test comes they call for continued and increased power for public officials.

Mr. Speaker, the test is here. The test has been long overdue. Are we going to give our people, and the rest of the world true statesmanship, built on first principles?

I am reminded of the words of a free American from the debate on price regulations of February 14, 1777, in the Continental Congress, where Mr. Benjamin Rush stated:

> The salvation of this continent depends upon the authority of this Congress being held as sacred as the cause of liberty itself. It becomes us, therefore, to be careful of the remains of our authority and character.

We know that what this Nation and other nations expect from the United States at this crucial moment in history is production and more production of vital foods and clothing and shelter for consumption at home and especially food for people abroad. Half of the starving are dependent upon us. The managed, controlled, and forced spirit of man will neither produce nor work nor fight nor make sacrifices necessary to rebuild a world civilization which was wrecked by an evil domination system which was built on absolute government control.

It is deplorable that 15 years of false indoctrination has dulled our sense of liberty, our passion for its products. Having won a complete victory over government-controlled systems in Germany and Japan, we too are in danger of continuing to follow the false philosophy of good coming from government interference, the Hegelian doctrine of the omnipotent state. It is Hegel who said:

> A state is the divine idea as it exists on earth and we must therefore worship the state as a manifestation of the Divine on earth. The state is the sole condition for the attainment of the particular end and good. The state must, in its constitution, permeate all situations.

The Members of this House are the representatives of a free people against these prophets of doom and gloom and their fundamental philosophy of life and government so completely out of line with truth and fact. I agree with Mr. Chester Bowles that "what is at stake is our entire economic future," only I believe that our future, as our glorious past, should be dedicated to freedom and faith and not to price control and fear.

We have corruption and we have black markets because we have man-made control instead of adherence to that fundamental law called the law of supply and demand. A natural law which is as inevitable and basic as the law of gravity cannot be set aside by any law even of Congress. Freemen meeting in a free market doing their free selling and buying proves to be far more honest in the long run than people who have Government officials looking over their shoulders every time they turn or every time they finish a product. Freedom is more honest than government and so much more productive.

Everything that is happening now points to the fact that if we now continue to substitute expediency for faith in freedom we are on the road to weakening more and more the central idea upon which the Republic was founded. We are on the way to corruption and disintegration. To guarantee that this catastrophe shall not happen to the last bastion of free enterprise or free economy in the whole world we must keep free from price controls and hold fast to our free economy.

If we cannot read history so well or act so courageously as our forefathers in dealing with price controls, we can imitate them. Let us take a leap of faith in freedom if we would have food, clothing, shelter, and the good life.

The Displaced Persons Act of 1948 and IRO Provisions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ARTHUR G. KLEIN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the Displaced Persons Act of 1948 was a terrible blow to those of us who believed that the tradition of hospitality of the United States, and our contemporary international obligations, made it a duty to welcome to this country a substantial number of the tragic victims of Nazi bloodlust who now are known by the chilling phrase, "displaced persons."

We were aware that a mere trickle of immigration took place during the war years, and, all humanitarian considerations aside, it seemed logical to suppose that the Congress would make provision without trepidation for the immigration of numbers at least equalling the unused quotas of those years.

The revulsion against the discriminatory act which was finally adopted has led to some rather strong denunciations.

In the interest of clarity, and to make the terms of the IRO constitution adopted in the act by reference known to every one, I am inserting a synopsis of the act prepared by the International Refugee Organization, including the IRO definitions of displaced persons and the rather stringent standards set up for screening all DP's:

UNITED STATES OFFICE,
PREPARATORY COMMISSION,
INTERNATIONAL REFUGEE ORGANIZATION,
Washington, D. C., June 30, 1948.

IRO News Digest No. 13

SUMMARY OF PROVISIONS OF THE DISPLACED PERSONS ACT OF 1948 (PUBLIC LAW 774, 80TH CONG.) AND DEFINITIONS OF ELIGIBILITY UNDER THE IRO CONSTITUTION

I. Number of displaced persons to be admitted:

Two hundred thousand displaced persons and refugees designated as eligible for IRO care under terms of the IRO constitution.

Two thousand recent refugees from Czechoslovakia.

Three thousand displaced orphan children under the age of 16 years.

Fifteen thousand aliens now resident in the United States.

II. Eligibility requirements:

(a) Displaced persons: To be eligible for admission to the United States a displaced person must:

1. Be included among those eligible for IRO asistance under terms of the IRO constitution. (See IRO definitions.)

2. Have entered Germany, Austria, or Italy on or after September 1, 1939, and on or before December 22, 1945:

3. Have been in the western zones of Germany and Austria or in Italy on January 1, 1948; and

4. Be qualified for admission under immigration laws and regulations of the United States.

The spouse and unmarried dependent children of displaced persons eligible for admission will also be considered eligible for admission if they are otherwise qualified under immigration laws.

(b) Czech refugees—To gain admission, the 2,000 Czech refugees included in the act must:

Be natives who fled Czechoslovakia as a direct result of persecution or fear of persecution since January 1, 1948; and also have been in Italy or in the western zones of Germany or Austria on the effective date of the act. In addition they must be qualified for admission into the United States under immigration laws and regulations of the United States. The spouse and unmarried dependent children of eligible Czech refugees may also be considered eligible if they qualify under the immigration laws.

(c) Orphan children: Displaced orphan children to be admitted must:

1. Be under 16 years of age;

2. Be qualified for admission under United States immigration laws;

3. Be orphaned due to the death or disappearance of both parents;

4. And, must have been in Italy or the western zones of Germany or Austria on the effective date of the act.

(d) Resident aliens: Aliens now resident in the United States may be admitted to permanent residence if they:

1. Entered the United States prior to April 1, 1948;

2. Are otherwise admissible under the immigration laws;

3. Can establish the fact of lawful entry into the United States as nonimmigrants or as nonquota immigrant students pursuant to applicable immigration laws;

4. Can establish the fact that they are displaced from country of birth or nationality or last residence as a result of events subsequent to the outbreak of World War II and are unable to return to such countries because of persecution or fear of persecution on account of race, religion, or political opinion.

Admission of aliens for permanent residence is dependent upon certification by the Attorney General to Congress that each individual is qualified for permanent residence under terms of the act and is further dependent on passage of a joint resolution by Congress in each case, stating that Congress favors granting the status of permanent residence.

III. Conditions governing admission:

In addition to eligibility requirements summarized above, the act provides the following conditions which must be met before admission of a displaced person for permanent residence may be accomplished:

(a) Jobs and housing: In the case of displaced persons and Czech refugees to be admitted under the act, assurances must be given, in accordance with regulations of the Commission established to administer the act, that each person admitted will be suitably employed without displacing some other person from employment, that each displaced person and his dependents will not become public charges, and that they will have safe and sanitary housing without displacing some other person.

(b) National origins: Forty percent of all visas issued under the act are available exclusively to eligible displaced persons whose place of origin or country of nationality has been annexed by a foreign power.

(c) Use of national immigration quotas: Although provision is made for issuance of 202,000 visas to displaced persons and Czech refugees within the 2 following fiscal years, the act further provides that the quotas of the chargeable countries shall be mortgaged up to 50 percent of the annual total for as many years as necessary to compensate for the numbers actually admitted.

(d) Provision for children: Displaced orphan children to be admitted under the act specifically are exempted from the quota provisions applicable to other displaced persons and refugees. However, the act provides that, before the children may be admitted, satisfactory assurances must be given that they will be cared for properly, in accordance with regulations of the Commission.

(e) Character investigation: The act provides that, before a displaced person or refugee may be accepted for admission, a thorough investigation and a written report shall be made regarding each individual's character, history, and eligibility under the act.

IV. Preferences and priorities:

In lieu of existing immigration preferences stated by law, the act provides the following preferences:

1. First preference in immigration is given to persons previously engaged in agricultural pursuits and who will be engaged in agricultural pursuits upon admission to the United States. Not less than 30 percent of all visas issued under the act will be made available to this occupational group. Wives and unmarried dependent children of persons admitted under this preference will be counted as agriculturists.

2. Second preference is given to household, construction, clothing, and garment workers or other workers needed in the locality in the United States in which they propose to reside. Also included in this preference group are persons possessing special educational, scientific, technological, or professional qualifications.

3. Third preference is given to displaced persons who are blood relatives of citizens or lawfully admitted aliens in the United States.

Within the preferences stated in the act, priorities are to be given to persons, who, during World War II, bore arms against the enemies of the United States and to persons who were, on January 1, 1948, living in displaced persons camps and assembly centers. Provision is made that in exceptional cases visas may be issued to persons otherwise eligible who are located outside the camps.

V. Administration:

The act provides for the establishment of a Displaced Persons Commission consisting of three members to be appointed by the President with approval of the Senate, one member to be designated as chairman. The Commission will be responsible for formulating and issuing regulations necessary for promulgation of the act and for developing and implementing plans and regulations designed to achieve general settlement and distribution throughout the United States and its territories and possessions of persons admitted. The Commission is also responsible for reporting to Congress and the President on the manner in which the law is being carried out and on the status of displaced persons admitted under its terms.

Other governmental functions necessary to the implementation of the act will be performed by regularly established agencies of the Government. These functions will include selection, screening and processing of persons to be admitted, issuance of visas and implementation of regular immigration procedures.

VI. Reporting of status:

Each displaced person admitted, with the exception of dependent children, will be required to report on his employment and residence to the Displaced Persons Commission every 6 months for the first 2 years of residence in the United States.

VII. Revocation of the Truman directive:

Beginning July 1, 1948, displaced persons are no longer granted preference or priority under the regular immigration laws because of their status as displaced persons. This provision nullifies an Executive order issued in December 1945, which granted immigration preference to bona fide displaced persons.

VIII. Admission of Volksdeutche:

Included in the Displaced Persons Act is a provision which will make immigration visas available to the so-called Volksdeutche—persons of German ethnic origin who were born in Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Rumania, or Yugoslavia and who are residing in Germany and Austria on the effective date of the act. To accommodate these persons, the German and Austria quotas are reactivated with the proviso that 50 percent of the visas issued in the 2-year fiscal period beginning July 1, 1948, shall be reserved for the Volksdeutche from the above-named countries.

IRO DEFINITIONS OF DISPLACED PERSONS

A displaced person eligible for admission in the United States is defined by the Displaced Persons Act of 1948 as "any displaced person or refugee as defined in annex I of the constitution of the International Refugee Organization and who is the concern of the International Refugee Organization." The pertinent section of annex I of the IRO constitution is quoted below to indicate the specific classes of displaced persons who will be eligible under this definition. Also quoted is part II of annex I in which are listed certain categories of individuals who are not eligible for IRO assistance. (It should be noted that the Czech refugees admissible under section 12 of the act are not included among persons eligible for IRO assistance.)

Part I. Refugees and displaced persons within the meaning of the resolution adopted by the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations on February 15, 1946

Section A. Definition of Refugees

1. Subject to the provisions of sections C and D and of part II of this annex, the term "refugee" applies to a person who has left, or who is outside of, his country of nationality or of former habitual residence, and who, whether or not he had retained his nationality, belongs to one of the following categories: (a) victims of the nazi or fascist regimes or of regimes which took part on their side in the Second World War, or of the quisling or similar regimes which assisted them against the United Nations, whether enjoying international status as refugees or not; (b) Spanish Republicans and other victims of the Falangist regime in Spain, whether enjoying international status as refugees or not; (c) persons who were considered refugees before the outbreak of the Second World War, for reasons of race, religion, nationality, or political opinion.

2. Subject to the provisions of sections C and D and of part II of this annex regarding the exclusion of certain categories of persons, including war criminals, quislings, and traitors, from the benefits of the Organization, the term "refugee" also applies to a person, other than a displaced person as defined in section B of this annex, who is outside of his country of nationality or former habitual residence, and who, as a result of events subsequent to the outbreak of the Second World War, is unable or unwilling to avail himself of the protection of the government of his country of nationality or former nationality.

3. Subject to the provisions of section D and of part II of this annex, the term "refugee" also applies to persons who, having resided in Germany or Austria and being of Jewish origin or foreigners or stateless persons, were victims of Nazi persecution and were detained in, or were obliged to flee from, and were subsequently returned to, one of those countries as a result of enemy action, or of war circumstances, and have not yet been firmly resettled therein.

4. The term "refugee" also applies to unaccompanied children who are war orphans or whose parents have disappeared, and who are outside their countries of origin. Such children, 16 years of age or under, shall be given all possible priority assistance, including, normally, assistance in repatriation in the case of those whose nationality can be determined.

Section B. Definition of Displaced Persons

The term "displaced person" applies to a person who, as a result of the actions of the authorities of the regimes mentioned in part I, section A, paragraph 1 (a) of this annex, has been deported from, or has been obliged to leave, his country of nationality or of former habitual residence, such as persons who were compelled to undertake forced labor or who were deported for racial, religious, or political reasons. Displaced persons will only fall within the mandate of the Organization subject to the provisions of sections C and D of part I and to the provisions of part II of this annex. If the reasons for their displacement have ceased to exist, they should be repatriated as soon as possible in accordance with article 2, paragraph 1 (a), of this constitution, and subject to the provision of paragraph (c), subparagraphs (ii) and (iii), of the General Assembly resolution of February 12, 1946, regarding the problem of refugees (annex III).

Section C. Conditions Under Which Refugees and Displaced Persons Will Become the Concern of the Organization (Summarized)

All displaced persons and refugees included in the IRO definitions will be the concern of the Organization if they:

1. Can be repatriated and the help of the Organization is required to provide for their repatriation.

2. Have definitely expressed valid objections to repatriation after having received adequate information concerning conditions existing in their countries of origin.

Spanish Republican refugees will be the concern of the Organization so long as the Falangist regime in Spain continues.

Section D. Annex I, Circumstances in Which Refugees and Displaced Persons Will Cease To Be the Concern of the Organization

Refugees or displaced persons will cease to be the concern of the Organization: (a) When they have returned to the countries of their nationality in United Nations territory, unless their former habitual residence to which they wish to return is outside their country of nationality; or (b) when they have acquired a new nationality; or (c) when they have, in the determination of the Organization become otherwise firmly established; or (d) when they have unreasonably refused to accept the proposals of the Organization for their resettlement or repatriation; or (e) when they are making no substantial effort toward earning their living when it is possible for them to do so, or when they are exploiting the assistance of the Organization.

Part II

Persons who will not be the concern of the organization:

1. War criminals, quislings, and traitors.

2. Any other persons who can be shown: (a) To have assisted the enemy in persecuting civil populations of countries, members of the United Nations; or (b) to have voluntarily assisted the enemy forces since the outbreak of the Second World War in their operations against the United Nations.[1]

3. Ordinary criminals who are extraditable by treaty.

4. Persons of German ethnic origin, whether German nationals or members of German minorities in other countries, who: (a) Have been or may be transferred to Germany from other countries; (b) have been, during the Second World War, evacuated from Germany to other countries; (c) have fled from or into Germany, or from their places of residence into countries other than Germany in order to avoid falling into the hands of Allied armies.

5. Persons who are in receipt of financial support and protection from their country of nationality, unless their country of nationality requests international assistance for them.

6. Persons who, since the end of hostilities in the Second World War: (a) Have participated in any organization having as one of its purposes the overthrow by armed force of the Government of their country of origin, being a member of the United Nations; or the overthrow by armed force of the Government of any other member of the United Nations, or have participated in any terrorist organization; (b) have become leaders of movements hostile to the Government of their country of origin being a member of the United Nations or sponsors of movements encouraging refugees not to return to their country of origin; (c) at the time of application for assistance are in the military or civil service of a foreign state.

[1] Mere continuance of normal and peaceful duties, not performed with the specific purpose of aiding the enemy against the Allies or against the civil population of territory in enemy occupation, shall not be considered to constitute "voluntary assistance." Nor shall acts of general humanity, such as care of wounded or dying, be so considered except in cases where help of this nature given to enemy nationals could equally well have been given to Allied nationals and was purposely withheld from them.

The State of the Union

OF

HON. WILLIAM LEMKE

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. LEMKE. Mr. Speaker, nowhere in the world today, except in Switzerland, is there a nation in which the right of free speech and the habit of open discussion on national and international issues are more enjoyed, or more appreciated, than in the United States. Through this privilege, and because of it, we are a better-informed people.

Within recent years, we have been confronted with tremendously vital issues—issues that have aroused nationwide interest and comment. Some of these issues will be largely decided by the American people on November 2. Theirs will be an important decision—a decision that will not only affect our own lives, but the lives of many future generations. To their collective judgment all must submit. If that judgment is based upon reason—and supported by facts—then they will have discharged their full duty to themselves, their State, and Nation.

If the electors have had enough of shortages, such as lumber and building material with which to build homes for the GI's—if they have had enough of bureaucratic giving away of America—of depleting our natural resources—if they have had enough of bottlenecking and regimentation—then they will vote for a change of administration. A change is long past due.

To continue the same administration in power for 16 years is not healthy for our Republic. It invites undesirables, inefficiency, incompetence, and graft in public office.

Let us take a look at the Roosevelt-Truman administration. It is not a pretty picture—high cost of living, shortage of houses, gray and black markets in automobiles, farm implements, and other articles in short supply. In addition, there is inefficiency and abuse in the distribution of war-surplus property as well as the wholesale waste and the squandering of public funds. The President, who is responsible for this situation, is now attempting to put the blame on Congress. He is not willing to acknowledge his own failures and accept his own responsibility.

Surely the President knows that his and F. D. R.'s international policies, blunders, are responsible for the high cost of living and the shortage of homes. He knows that the internationalists for a profit, and the foreign purchasing agents, with billions of dollars of our gifts and credits, have and are depleting our Nation of food products and building material by purchasing same with our money and shipping it to other nations.

He knows that playing gaudy Santa Claus to the rest of the world leads to ultimate depletion of our natural resources and means national suicide. He knows that as a result of this foreign competition, with our own money in our domestic markets, the cost of living has reached the point where some American families can no longer maintain the American standard of living.

The President knows that as a result of this foreign competition with our money, some of the veterans that helped to win World War II, that other nations started, are now compelled to live in garages and basements while his administration has been building homes for Italians, British, and other nations' people abroad.

The President knows that in the face of a fuel shortage this coming winter, his administration is exporting 65,000,000 tons of coal to Europe. He knows that in the first 5 months of this year it shipped 42,450,000 pounds of meat to other nations. He knows that this does not include the seven and a half million pounds of meat shipped by CARE and other charitable organizations.

He also knows that this does not include the millions of pounds shipped abroad for our own Army, and the civilians fed by our Army. He knows that he is not only arming the Greeks, but feeding the Greek Army as well. Little wonder that meat is scarce and prices high.

The President has the power to stop this international flirtation—this foolish attempt of buying friendship. He has the power to stop all foreign exportations of any and all building material used in the construction of houses until the GI's have homes to live in on the American standard.

The President has the power to stop the shipment of all food products necessary to maintain the American people on the American standard until the cost of living, through natural economic laws, has come down to a reasonable level. He has the power to stop foreign shipments of farm implements, automobiles, and other articles in short supply until the American needs are satisfied.

No one objects to using any and all surpluses of American foods to assist in feeding the hungry of other nations. This, however, is not being done. Our gifts and credits are given to foreign governments, not to hungry and deserving people. These governments sell these gifts to their own well-to-do and wealthy people as well as to those of other nations. In fact, these nations are playing us for a sucker—for being gullible.

No one objects to the President using the money appropriated for the Marshall plan to buy surplus food and clothing from our own people as well as other nations for those in want. However, we insist that this be distributed through the Red Cross, the Salvation Army, and other fraternal and social organizations—not through the internationalists for a profit nor through grafting governments. But since the President refuses to use that authority, since he seems to be in the hands of the economic royalists, let us have a change in administration.

In recent months the multimillionaires in the executive departments—the parasites who consume, but do not create wealth—together with the cost plusers, and official commodity gamblers with inside information all joined in accusing the farmer for the high cost of living. A guilty conscience always protests too much.

The international profiteers again made millions out of the blood, the tears, and the agony of World War II. They are again taking their toll out of the billions of dollars of credits that we have given to Europe—some of it to help feed the hungry people, most of it for armament purposes.

It is a mistake for the consumer to blame the farmer for the high cost of living. The farmer gets only a small part of the high cost and he pays a large part of it. The farmer is not responsible for the blunders of the President and the executive departments.

The time has come that we understand each other's problems better. The fact that the farmer, because of six good crops and war prices, has been able to temporarily pay off some of his mortgages, does not give the true picture. There is no reason why anyone should envy the farmer.

We know that the present conditions will not continue. We know that all of us have been living in a fool's paradise. We know that the farmer's dollar, the same as ours, is worth only 30 cents in purchasing power. The farmer produces enough food for all of us. He is not responsible if the President gives it to foreign nations.

In my State, 90 percent of all the new wealth created each year comes from the soil—is produced by the farmer. Every building in every village, city, and town in my State has or will be largely paid for with the wealth produced from the soil. There is not a business or professional man or woman, or a laborer in my State whose prosperity does not depend upon the prosperity of agriculture, whose welfare is not linked with that of the farmer. What is true of my State is true of other States.

Ever since I have been a Member of Congress, I have advocated making the Frazier-Lemke moratorium permanent and giving agriculture cost of production. But about all that the administration was willing to give the farmer was lip service. During the time I have been a Member here, not with my vote, but by the vote that favored the internationalists, the reciprocal trade agreements were passed. I voted against these agreements on every occasion. I knew then, and I know now, that these trade agreements were born in the fertile brain of the international manufacturers and bankers—economic royalists.

When the reciprocal trade agreements were brought up for the first time in 1934 the international bankers and manufacturers were out in the open. They boldly proclaimed that, in order to collect what foreign nations owed them, we would have to surrender our local market to these nations until the debts were liquidated. They did not, however, tell us that the farmer, the laborer, and the small producer would be made the shock absorbers.

Every reciprocal trade agreement that has been made since the inception of these laws was made in favor of the international manufacturers and bankers. In every such agreement the farmer, the laborer, and the small-business man was sold down the river.

These agreements were the forerunners of an international conference held recently where the foreign horse traders, with the consent of our Government, decided that the farmer's maximum price on wheat should be $2.10 per bushel, less transportation and commission charges. If Congress had accepted this conference agreement, then the North Dakota farmer would receive about $1.10 per bushel for his wheat in the local markets. Congress, however, refused to accept this agreement and continued the support price.

This agreement is in line with the action of the Department of Agriculture in 1946, when it cheated many farmers out of the 30 cents bonus on their corn and wheat—when it manipulated some farmers out of $3 a bushel on their flax.

The Department, with advanced knowledge of the forthcoming Executive bonus order, and with the advanced knowledge that the ceiling price on flax would be removed, informed the farmer that the price of corn and wheat would not go up and that the ceiling would be continued for another year on flax.

I repeat the time has come for a square deal for agriculture. The time has come that we all understand the agricultural problem. The time has come that all farm leaders get busy and see to it that the farmer gets a floor—cost of production—100 percent parity.

May I call your attention to the fact that the farm population has decreased from 33,000,000 to about 19,000,000, while the general population has increased about 20,000,000. Likewise, the farmers' influence in Congress has decreased from about one-third to about one-seventh. The time has come for the farmers to insist that their leaders get busy and help get permanent legislation for their protection.

As a Member of Congress, I insist that all branches of our Government again observe the Constitution—the Constitution that protects minorities and the unfortunate from persecution at the hands of a reckless bureaucracy. I advocate a change of administration so that the Federal courts will again function, not as the tool of the Executive, but as an independent coordinate branch of our Government.

The Roosevelt-Truman regime appointed all 9 of the Supreme Court Judges. It appointed 41 of the 59 circuit court judges—only 18 hold-overs left. It appointed 133 out of 193 district judges—only 60 hold-overs left. It is obvious that our Federal courts have become political and lopsided, and, more obvious, that we need a change of administration.

As a Member I favor the nomination and the election of the President and Vice President by popular vote in a direct primary and general election. This will reduce political manipulation and corruption, self-perpetuation in office, and the unwarranted assumption of Executive power.

I favor the prohibition of any political, economical, financial, or military commitments, treaties, agreements, undertakings, entanglements, or alliances with any foreign nation or combination of nations, except by authorization and approval of Congress. This puts the responsibility of our dealings with foreign nations on Congress, where it belongs. This will prevent foreign nations, in the future, from exploiting our people and involving us in their quarrels and wars.

I have at all times favored a living wage for common labor on the American standard, and the ultimate abolishment of slums. There must be an economic floor below which no human being is permitted to fall. I believe in employment assurance rather than in unemployment insurance. To insure idleness is economic waste.

I feel that we must never forget that the veterans come first. It is the duty of the Government to see that the veterans are put in the same position as they would have been in if they had never been inducted into the armed forces. I have advocated that they should be compensated in paid-up life insurance to the same extent and equivalent in compensation as those who stayed at home received.

I believe that government by bureaucracy should be abolished. It is inconsistent with the American way of life. The legislative powers that have been granted, and now reside in many Government bureaus, commissions and agencies, should be restored to Congress. This in order to reestablish government by law and not by men.

I feel that Congress should rewrite and simplify our whole tax system, to protect private property and enterprise from confiscation by taxation. It must protect small business, agriculture, and individual enterprise by eliminating the economical domination of corporate monopoly. Property rights are but human rights when properly distributed.

I feel that there must be an intelligent old-age compensation—security from want. Any person who has worked from the ages of 20 to 60 has produced enough wealth to last for life. If such a person finds himself in financial distress, and without the means of a comfortable livelihood, then it is because society appropriated the wealth he created. Therefore it is society's duty to protect such a person from want.

Finally I feel that Federal aid should be limited to wealth-saving, wealth-producing, health-promoting, and educational projects. Deficit spending must stop. The budget must be balanced. However, in order to accomplish this, the governors, and State and local officials must understand that deficit begging must also stop.

The time has come for serious thinking if American civilization is to survive. We need a change of administration.

Address of Hon. Dewey Short, of Missouri, to the Voters of the Seventh Congressional District of Missouri

OF

HON. DEWEY SHORT

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I submit the following radio broadcast delivered by me over Station KSWM, Joplin, Mo., July 28, 1948:

Voters of the Seventh Congressional District in Missouri, it is good to be back home. Since returning 3 weeks ago I have had the pleasure of speaking two and three times each day in most of the 15 counties in our district. I am scheduled to speak two and three times each day in the remaining counties of our district between now and August 3.

Formerly Members of Congress could spend a few months in each year visiting their constituents back home, but since 1938 Congress has been in almost continuous session with only a few days off at Christmastime, and it has been impossible to return home as often as one would like.

For the past 16 years the New Deal has fed and fattened on emergencies. We have had one crisis after another and more special sessions of Congress have been called than ever before in a similar period of our history.

Out of spite and for purely political purposes President Truman has called the Congress into special session on July 26 merely to put the southern Democrats and Republicans on the spot and behind the political eight ball. I shall not return to Washington for another week until after our primary, because it will be another week after August 3 before any important legislation can be brought before the House for consideration.

Furthermore, if President Truman can travel with his cronies in a special train at the taxpayers' expense across the continent for 3 weeks while Congress is in session to denounce us as the worst Congress in history, certainly I should be allowed to spend an extra week in my own district at my own expense to report first-hand to my own people just what the Eightieth Congress has accomplished. Of course, High Tax Harry wants all us Republicans back in Washington. Certainly he does not want me out here in my district, because the speeches I am making are doing him no good.

For 16 long years the Republicans were completely out of control of all three branches of our Government. The New Dealers dominated the executive, judicial, and legislative branches. They still control the Presidency and our courts because of the majority of appointments under the long tenure of Mr. Roosevelt.

Two years ago, in the last 1946 election, the Republicans promised the taxpayers of the Nation certain definite things if they would elect a Republican Congress. They did.

Following VE- and VJ-day we had a long series of industrial disputes and strikes that brought on unemployment, reduced production, and we found ourselves in a state of stagnation, almost in the throes of Nation-wide industrial and commercial paralysis.

When the Eightieth Congress convened January 3, 1947, by mandate of an aroused people, we were confronted by the disastrous results of 14 years of New Deal bungling, waste, inefficiency, and bad government. Our country was on the brink of disaster, threatened as it was by economic disintegration of our free economy and revolutionary changes brought largely about by infiltration of Communists in our Government.

A radical-minded administration, driving for ever-increasing control and authority over the lives and activities of our citizens, was rapidly chipping away our freedom and destroying our liberties. Our efforts as a nation for production and plenty, for happiness and security, were being destroyed until we had almost reached the stage of anarchy.

The Republican Congress, with understanding, courage, and foresight, met the challenge to the preservation of the Republic and, reversing the ruinous New Deal policies, largely returned our American Government to the people themselves and established solid foundations upon which our country can now go forward.

The first thing we did was to free competitive enterprise and once more establish individual initiative, liberating the people from 76,000 bureaucratic rules, regulations, directives, and orders, thereby releasing the energy and the capacity of the people with resulting all-time highs in employment, production, profits, and wages, and a record $200,000,000,000 annual national income.

By cutting the number of Federal employees from 3,000,000 to approximately 2,000,000 we balanced the Federal budget. The Federal Treasury for the first time in 16 years is using black ink instead of red and is no longer resorting to inflationary deficit spending. Fiscal 1948 ended with the biggest Treasury surplus in all history, almost $8,500,000,000, or seven times the previous high established 21 years ago under a Republican administration. At long last we are now spending less money than we are taking in.

Notwithstanding increased appropriations for national defense and foreign aid under the Marshall plan we have prudently shaved $7,000,000,000 off the public debt. This is because we have pruned spendthrift budgets by cutting President Truman's padded budgets more than $6,000,000,000 and lopped off more billions in hold-over wartime appropriations in the greatest Government financial conversion from war to peace in all time.

Two years ago, in 1946, we Republicans further promised the taxpayers that we would give them relief if returned to power. We have kept that promise to cut taxes. With the help of Democrats in both House and Senate we succeeded in overriding Mr. Truman's third veto of the tax bill, reducing taxes $4,800,000,000, with 71 percent of the tax relief going to those with incomes under $5,000. About 7,500,000 wage earners in the lowest brackets were removed altogether from the tax roll and married couples were allowed to divide their income for tax purposes, and special relief was granted for persons over 65 and for those who are blind.

The Eightieth Congress also improved labor-management relations by getting enough Democrats in both Houses to join the Republicans to pass over Presidential veto the Taft-Hartley Labor-Management Act, providing fair and just procedures for peaceable settlement of labor-management disputes; protecting the rights of workers to unionize and control their unions, to bargain collectively, and to strike; restoring constitutional rights of employers and safeguarding all the people against widespread work and production stoppages that imperiled the national welfare. Eighty-five million fewer man-days have been lost in strikes since the passage of the Taft-Hartley Labor Act than were lost in the year prior to its passage.

Many Communists have been exposed by the Eightieth Congress, which has battled for elimination of not only Communists but Fascists and other subversives from the Federal Government. Much Communist infiltration in a minority of labor unions and in the Hollywood film industry has been exposed, others have been jailed for contempt of Congress and some top Soviet Russian agents have landed in jail. We advanced legislation for public registration of alien controlled Communists.

Realizing that in this postwar period of uncertainty when the world is full of trouble we must remain strong in the air, on land and sea, we have strengthened our national defense by appropriating approximately $21,000,000,000, with special emphasis upon air power, and provided for scientific research and technological developments. We have newer and better weapons, including atomic bombs and bacteriological warfare. We are now building a strong centralized intelligence, have authorized $852,000,000 for a 70-group air force, $178,000,000 for merchant marine expansion and revised Army justice in an effort to give fair treatment to enlisted men and officers alike.

Twice in our generation we have fought and won two devastating world wars, and though victory was ours both times our Nation has spent much of its wealth and depleted many of its resources. We furnished 70 percent of all the oil to our allies in the recent conflict, and we furnished $50,000,000,000 in lend-lease to them, while spending $340,000,000,000 of our own money to feed, clothe, and equip 12,000,000 men and women in our own armed services. We have pumped many of our oil wells dry, hewn down many of our best forests, dug much of the lead and zinc out of this tri-State area, drawn much of the copper out of Arizona and Montana and largely depleted our iron-ore deposits on the Mesabi Range in Minnesota.

Fellow citizens, should the United States become engaged in a major war today we would find ourselves in a very precarious position due chiefly to the lack of strategic and critical materials and minerals to make the weapons with which to fight. Modern mechanized warfare consumes enormous quantities of raw materials. Lead and zinc are in critically short supply in this country, and in spite of the fact that we have been trying for the past 2 years to build a stock pile of raw materials for national defense, we have no lead and zinc in that stock pile now. Because of this serious shortage a bill which would bolster the price of lead was introduced in the Eightieth Congress. Representing a great mining district and serving on the Armed Services Committee, charged with the responsibility of our national security, I realize the dire need, the absolute necessity, for getting these minerals. I talked to members of the Committee on Public Lands and urged that the bill be reported—it was. I then went before the Rules Committee and we succeeded in getting a rule for its consideration on the floor of the House. I next spoke on the floor of the House urging the passage of the bill, and it carried almost unanimously. I then worked among my colleagues in the Senate, and that body passed the bill by a voice vote. But after Congress adjourned last year President Truman vetoed the bill, and that is the chief reason we have no lead and zinc in our stock pile today.

Many of the mines in the tri-State area have been closed, ore production has fallen off, and many of our miners are out of work. Every business in Joplin and the tri-State area is feeling the ill effects of our present most unfortunate situation.

Ours is not only a great mining district but chiefly a great agricultural district. Dairying, poultry raising, fruit and livestock growing add to its diversity. As I have tried to help our mining industry, so I have tried to help agriculture. The Eightieth Congress did not overlook our farmers. We adopted a long-range agriculture program, pleading price support for maximum production of food, provided twice as much money for rural electrification as any previous Congress, voting $400,000,000 for the REA this fiscal year, or $100,000,000 more than was requested by the President or the director of the annual budget. We appropriated more than $500,000,000 for soil conservation, launched the greatest rural road-building program in history, fostered stability of agriculture through a new workable Crop Insurance Act, chartered Commodity Credit Corporation, and greatly expanded Government aid in campaigns against livestock foot-and-mouth disease and crop deterrents such as weeds, insects, and other pests. We provided generously for reclamation, river and harbor improvements, and flood control.

Having volunteered in the First World War, I always have been interested in the welfare of the veterans of all our wars. I have personally handled hundreds, if not thousands, of individual claims and voted for all their benefits; for veterans of the Civil War, Spanish-American War, the Philippine Insurrection, our Indian wars, and for soldiers of World Wars I and II, as well as for their widows, orphans, and dependents. The Congress just adjourned passed 188 bills meeting needs of war veterans, including increased compensation for disabled veterans with and without dependents, for dependent survivors of war dead, increased subsistence payments to World War II veterans in institutional training, additional allowances for student GI's, increased proportional pay for veterans in on-the-job training, for cashing of GI terminal-leave bonds, higher pensions for Spanish-American War veterans, and aids for veterans' housing.

We took the housing problem from the bungling New Deal administration, freed the building industry of stifling rules, regulations, and directives, stimulated construction through Government guaranties of building loans, had the Government assume a large part of the responsibility for veterans' loans and gave war veterans priority in home building and rental of new homes. In 1946 under New Deal regimentation and confusion 437,800 dwelling units were completed. In 1947 under Republican free enterprise and sound Government aid almost twice that number of units were completed, and in 1948 a million dwelling units will be completed in the biggest building boom of all time.

Nor did the Eightieth Congress neglect the old people of our country. We expanded social security, passed over Presidential veto a bill increasing payment by $5 per month for the needy, aged, and blind, and increased payments by $3 per month for each dependent child. We also exempted from social-security insurance payments newspaper and magazine vendors and other independent contractors over whom no employer exercises direct control, thereby preventing an impairment of the old-age and survivors' insurance trust fund built up by those who had paid taxes over the years. We provided $500,000 for research to combat heart disease and voted $28,400,000 for the National Cancer Institution to study the disease of cancer and to disseminate knowledge on how to reduce its terrible toll in lives.

We provided a cost of living pay increase for postal and other Federal employees despite President Truman's opposition and gave 478,000 postal workers a pay increase of $450 a year each, and 840,000 civil-service employees a boost of $330 each. We also voted an increase for retired railroad men out of their own railroad retirement fund.

We submitted to the States for ratification a constitutional amendment limiting all Presidents to two terms. Had this provision been in our Constitution years ago we would not be in our awful plight today. We have aided small business by creating special committees of the Senate and House which are seeing that small businesses, the backbone of American industry, get a fair break, especially in the awarding of Government contracts for national defense and aid to foreign nations.

Many other progressive and helpful measures were passed by the Eightieth Congress which I do not have time to discuss in this broadcast.

In the light of this record and because I voted for all these constructive and helpful measures, I am surprised that some of my opposition in this campaign are saying that DEWEY SHORT has been in Washington 16 years and all he has said was "No, no, no."

Well, thank goodness I had the courage and nerve to say "No" when it was unpopular. I said "No" to the NRA and the blue buzzard because I thought it was unconstitutional, and it was so declared unanimously a little later by the Supreme Court. I said "No" to the WPA when they were wasting public funds and using the taxpayers' money as a slush fund to keep the New Dealers in power. I said "No" to the OPA, which placed a ceiling on farm prices lower than the cost of production, that created black markets and made crooks out of honest citizens. I said "No" to the ignoble attempt to pack the Supreme Court. I said "No" to warmongering, jingoistic bellowing, and diplomatic blundering that led us to a global conflict that well-nigh ended in the annihilation of civilization. I said "No" to the coddling of Communists and the appointment of wild-eyed radicals to highly responsible and secret positions in our Government. I said "No" not only to waste, extravagance, and inefficiency, but to many downright dishonest practices by those in high authority.

But, my friends, I have often said "Yes," though the New Dealers will not tell you about that. I said "Yes" to reduce the number of Federal employees and to balance our budget by spending less than we took in. I said "Yes" to the total reduction in the President's budget estimates. I said "Yes" to reduce taxes over the President's veto. I said "Yes" to the enactment of a fair, just, and workable labor law that has brought about stoppage in strikes, increased production, and improved labor-management relations. I said "Yes" to cutting the national debt and to abolition of many bureaucratic agencies with their arbitrary rules and regulations. I said "Yes" to expose Communists and to keep undesirables out of our country. I said "Yes" to strengthen our national defense on land, sea, and in the air, making our Nation invincible to attack, but not by adopting the old discredited European philosophy of peacetime conscription, which has led every nation which had it down the road to war and inevitably to defeat and ruin. I said "Yes" for the benefit of all the veterans of all our wars. I am a veteran myself. My primary opponent making the most noise was never in any branch of the armed services, though some of his supporters are trying to leave that impression. He got a civilian job a year after the shooting ended in this last war, and many of you know how he got it. If you don't I can tell you and show you.

I said "Yes" for the old people by voting originally for their pension and then to increase it. I said "Yes" for increasing the pay for our postal and other Federal employees to meet the increase in cost of living, as well as to give further aid to the retired railroad men. I voted "Yes" on many of the other pieces of legislation I have discussed.

It is true that I have served you in Congress for 16 years, and this is one of the strongest arguments why I should be returned to Washington in these trying times.

Thirty-two years ago Mr. Champ Clark, one of our greatest Missourians, who was then Democratic Speaker of the House, made a speech in 1916 to the "baby Congressmen." In speaking to the first-termers or freshmen among other things he said:

"It is a high honor to be a Representative in Congress if for only one term, and with a number of terms the honor increases. * * * A Member's usefulness to his country should increase in the same proportion. A man has to learn to be a Representative, just as he must learn to be a blacksmith, a carpenter, a farmer, an engineer, a lawyer, or a doctor"—

And I might add a miner.

"Useful and influential Congressmen are made largely by experience and practice. * * * It is an unwise performance for any district to change Representatives at short intervals. A new Congressman must begin at the foot of the class and spell up. Of course, the more brains, tact, energy, courage, and industry he has the quicker he will get up. If he possesses these qualities and if his constituents will keep him in the House he is as certain to rise as the sparks are to fly upward. No human power can keep him down. It is only fair and rational to assume that every Representative's constituents desire to see him among the top-notchers.

"Let us take the present House (this is Champ Clark speaking in 1916) and see how long the men who hold the high places have served—Mr. Speaker Cannon is serving his fortieth year—I am serving my twenty-second. Minority Leader Mann is serving his twentieth year; Mr. Fitzgerald, chairman of Appropriations, his eighteenth; Mr. Moon, chairman of Post Office and Post Roads, his twentieth; Mr. Jones, chairman of Insular Affairs, his twenty-sixth."

And so on down the line. Then Mr. Speaker Clark went on to say:

"Go through the whole list and you will find with few exceptions that the men of long service have the high places."

That was the picture of Congress 32 years ago in Champ Clark's day. The picture of Congress today is no different. Mr. SABBATH from Illinois is serving his forty-second year and was for several terms chairman of the powerful Rules Committee. ROBERT DOUGHTON, Democrat of North Carolina, who was chairman of Ways and Means, is completing his thirty-eighth year and is now candidate for re-election at the age of 82. SAM RAYBURN, one of the strongest Democratic Speakers we have ever had, is finishing his thirty-sixth year. BLAND of Virginia, who was chairman of Merchant Marine and Fisheries, has served 32 years, and LEA of California, formerly chairman of Interstate and Foreign Commerce, is retiring this year after 32 years of service. My good friend KNUTSON, Republican of Minnesota, is the present chairman of Ways and Means and is finishing his thirty-second year, or just twice as long as I have been in Congress. TABER of New York, chairman of Appropriations, has been there for a quarter of a century, as has WOLVERTON of New Jersey, the present chairman of Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Likewise Speaker JOE MARTIN.

My friends, in short, the top-notchers, the real leaders, the chairmen of the most powerful committees, are men who have served in Congress from 25 to 40 years and are considerably older in age than myself.

Though I turned 50 last April—and the next 10 years of my life should be the most fruitful and productive—and have served only 16 years in the House, I am scheduled to become chairman of the Armed Services Committee next January when the new Congress convenes. Mr. ANDREWS of New York, our present able and distinguished chairman, is retiring this year because of ill health. Because I have sat at his side for the past 14 years on the old Military Affairs Committee and now the new Committee on Armed Services and am ranking majority member, I will automatically become one of the youngest chairmen of one of the most powerful committees in the House if re-elected to a Republican Congress. This will bring honor not only to me but to our district and State.

I need not remind you that when you first sent me to Congress I was the lone wolf from Missouri. During all these years of the New Deal I have been largely hamstrung, hog-tied, and handicapped, fighting against overwhelming odds, but under a Republican administration I will, because of my 16 years seniority, my chairmanship of a powerful committee, and the friendships I have formed over the years by speaking for nearly all my Republican colleagues in practically every Republican district in the United States, be in a position of power and influence to render a great and constructive service to the people of this district, the State, and the Nation. I need not remind you that when I first went to Congress from this district half the courthouses in the 15 counties were filled with New Dealers. Today we have filled them all with Republicans and no longer am I alone in Washington, for Missouri now has 9 of the 13 House Members and both United States Senators for the first time since the Civil War. Always I have campaigned for the party as well as myself, trying my best to elect all candidates, from President of the United States down to constable of the smallest township. We have done pretty well considering the odds against us and I have tried to serve all the people of our district faithfully and well. The record is written; my position on every issue is known, it is down in black and white. After reading and studying critically and intelligently the record, with open minds and without prejudice, I do not believe that the voters of this district want to send a young, inexperienced, untried and unknown person to take the place of one who has stood up against the gun and fought the battle for 16 years and whose position on the many grave and complex problems confronting us is well known and is a matter of record.

Rural Electric Service to Cooperatives

OF
HON. WILLIAM LANGER
OF NORTH DAKOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a letter I have received from Mr. P. K. Mastel, coordinator of the Kem Electric Cooperative, Inc., relative to the furnishing of electric service to rural applicants, be printed in the RECORD, together with my reply.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

KEM ELECTRIC COOPERATIVE,
RURAL ELECTRIFICATION ADMINISTRATION,
Linton, N. Dak., July 31, 1948.

The Honorable WILLIAM LANGER,
Senator From North Dakota,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR LANGER: We have your inquiry as to the possibility of Mr. Gotthilf Zimmerman, of Ashley, N. Dak., receiving electric service.

It might be of interest to you to know that this office has numerous callers every week who state that they have been promised electric service within a short time; some as short as 3 months. We do not know where these promises come from, but some of the people seem to imply that they originate in your office. Promises such as these are very harmful at this time, when the question of power source is still one of our major problems.

This power question was to be taken up with you, Senator LANGER, at a political rally held the latter part of June at Wishek, N. Dak. But each time you were approached by the two representatives from this cooperative and the REA was mentioned you more or less avoided them and occupied yourself with someone else.

The power question is critical. At the present time we have not been able to execute a power contract with the Montana-Dakota Utilities Co., which will be our source of power. The company has consistently promised us the power, but when direct application was filed they have refused to grant a contract. Perhaps you could help us by giving your assistance in securing a power contract from the Montana-Dakota Utilities Co. The best help you and all your colleagues could have given your constituents would have been to quit playing politics during the last regular session of Congress and listening to the vile and vulgar voice of the power lobbyists and to assist the Bureau of Reclamation in their program to increase the sources of electric power.

Now, in regard to bringing electric service to Mr. Zimmerman. Plans are almost completed to let a contract for the construction of another 273 miles of lines. Part of this contract will cover the area in which Mr. Zimmerman lives. Therefore, if the power question can be settled he should receive electric service sometime in early summer of 1949.

Very truly yours,

P. K. MASTEL,
Coordinator, Kem Electric Cooperative, Inc.

Hon. P. K. MASTEL,
Coordinator, Kem Electric
Cooperative, Inc., Linton, N. Dak.

DEAR MR. MASTEL: Your letter of July 31, 1948, written not for yourself alone, but apparently on behalf of all the members of the Kem Electric Cooperative, has reached m', and I note and appreciate your words relative to the possibility of Mr. Gotthilf Zimmerman, of Ashley, receiving electric service.

Some time ago, I wrote you, as I did to all the coordinators and managers of REA, a full and complete report as to the results of the investigation made by my committee of the REA. Mr. Claude Wickard, Administrator of REA, together with others associated with him in directing that program, testified before the committee for many days.

I wrote you and the others definitely just exactly what was promised by them and I did not then, and I do not now, consider their promises harmful. I am attaching hereto a copy of that letter.

When I came here as United States Senator, out of the 48 States, North Dakota was at the very bottom in REA. In Montana, 25 farmers out of every 100 were receiving it, in Minnesota, 40 farmers out of every 100. Frankly, if you don't know it, you should know that the farmers and people in little towns in no other area in the United States received the poor deal at the hands of those administering REA since it was inaugurated years ago that those people in North Dakota did. I suggest that sometime you investigate, as I have investigated, why the dam was built at Fort Peck, Mont., instead of at Garrison, N. Dak., where it should have been built originally. I respectfully call your attention to the fact that I was not at that time a United States Senator and that, ever since I have been here, I have been trying to correct that action. In fact, I started it while I was still Governor, when we passed the law creating the Water Commission of North Dakota, which has been directly responsible for the various reclamation and flood control and power projects that the State is now receiving.

Also, I am particularly interested in your statement that at a political rally two representatives from your cooperative approached me and that every time that the "REA was mentioned you more or less avoided them and occupied yourself with someone else." The truth of the matter is that I arrived at Wishek early in the evening, that I stayed at the hotel all night, that I was in town all the next forenoon, and that neither you nor anyone else operating any REA cooperative approached me. The truth is that, before I went to Lisbon, the manager of the REA for that district asked me to meet with some 300 farmers having REA problems; and I met with them and arranged for another meeting later. The truth is, also, that I wrote to hundreds of the members of your cooperative saying that I would be at Wishek and that I would discuss REA with them if they wished; so that, if I was avoiding anybody, I took a most peculiar way of doing so.

Your letter is the first indication I have had from you or your cooperative that you have not been able to execute a power contract with the Montana-Dakota Utilities Co. You know, or you ought to know, that during the time that I was Governor the industrial commission, of which I was chairman, reduced the power rates for State institutions at Bismarck from 7 to 9 cents down to 1 cent for a 10-year period. During that time, too, we saved the people of Fargo over a million dollars, Grand Forks over $72,000 a year, and assisted other towns in getting reductions.

When you stated in your letter that the best help I could have given my constituents would have been to "quit playing politics during the last regular session of Congress, and listening to the vile and vulgar voice of the power lobbyists, and to assist the Bureau of Reclamation in their program to increase the sources of electric power," you are simply stating a deliberate falsehood, one entirely unworthy of you or any coordinator of any electric cooperative in North Dakota. What is more, you know it is a falsehood; and, further, you can go to any township in McIntosh or Emmons or Kidder County, which compose Kem, and call together a group of farmers and they will all tell you that it is a falsehood.

Ever since I have been down here I have cooperated wholeheartedly with every REA cooperative in North Dakota. At the hearings I called down P. J. Donnelly, president of the North Dakota Cooperatives, to testify. I called in James Coleman, of the Grand Forks Cooperative. I have repeatedly consulted the managers of the cooperatives all over the State. I have never listened to the "vile and vulgar voice of the power lobbyists," and you know it.

Now, whether you like it or don't like it, the fact remains that I am going to get REA for the farmers up there if it is possible to get it. At least a dozen times in speeches on the floor of the Senate I have so announced. In every election in North Dakota, I have had the violent opposition of the private power interests, and you know that, too. You know, too—or you ought to know—that at the very time that I was sentenced to the penitentiary the 11 leading power men in the State sat in the jury box rejoicing and congratulating themselves that they had gotten rid of me as Governor of the State. They knew we got the REA while I was Governor and that I fought for and signed the law.

In conclusion, I intend to keep on writing you about getting these farmers of your cooperative the electricity and power they need. As long as I have your cooperation, I will tell the people there that I have it. Whenever I don't get it, I will tell them. You are getting your pay, I assume, the same as I am getting mine—to help the common people. At least, as long as I hold this office, I intend to earn my salary.

When it comes to securing funds—in front of over 500 spectators I appeared before the Appropriations Committee, of which Senator MILTON YOUNG is a member, pleading and begging for more money for REA for North Dakota. Mr. Wickard was present and publicly stated he would, if possible, give to the North Dakota people the REA allocations of four States not using theirs. The chairman of that subcommittee publicly commended me for what he termed "the fighting speech I had put up for the farmers of North Dakota to get REA." He stated further, when I condemned him for not asking for more money, that if he had had the assistance of other Senators feeling like I did that he would have asked for more. President Truman recommended $300,000,000, and we got $400,000,000. In addition to that, I introduced a bill, a copy of which I am enclosing, in which I asked for $1,000,000,000. In addition to that, I appeared before the committee and urged passage of that bill. In addition to that, I had the support of cooperative after cooperative in North Dakota, who wrote in to me, and I presented these letters to the committee in support of that bill.

Now that I have brought my record on REA to your attention, I hope that never again will you use the breath that Almighty God gave you to say that I listened to the vile and vulgar voice of the power lobbyists and did not honestly represent the farmers of North Dakota.

Very sincerely yours,

WILLIAM LANGER.

Address of Hon. Abraham J. Multer, of New York, on July 9, 1948, at the World War II Dead Ceremony at the New York Port of Embarkation

OF

HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to me, I wish to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD my remarks at the World War II dead ceremony at the New York port of embarkation on July 9, 1948:

Colonel Lastayo, reverend clergy, officers and men of the armed services of our country, distinguished guests and relatives and friends of the departed heroic souls whose bodies we receive back to our shores today, my heart tells me that words of comfort and consolation should be uttered by my lips. My mind tells me how utterly futile are mere man's words at a time like this.

Let us turn then to a source in which we can find unending solace. Let us turn to the Bible for a few appropriate thoughts.

Oh, how well we know, that if the Bible had been read more thoroughly and with more understanding and had been more scrupulously adhered to through the ages, an occasion such as this would be unnecessary, in fact would have been impossible. What this world of ours needs more than anything else is more religion, more religious training and teaching and more religious living.

The world must turn back to religion and practice sincerely the preachments of the Bible if we are to prevent future conflicts.

It was Abraham Lincoln who said, "As I would not be a slave, so I would not be a master. This expresses my idea of democracy. Whatever differs from this, to the extent of the difference is no democracy."

Lincoln was a deeply religious man. His words, as just quoted, were his paraphrasing of the teachings of the Bible.

All wars through the years have been caused by the ungodly desire of some person or group of persons to enslave others. The exodus led by Moses to free the slaves of Egypt, the freeing of the slaves by Lincoln, the war to make the world free for democracy, and World War II, for the victory of which these brave lads gave their all, were founded on the basic concepts of democracy as found in the Bible.

The best tribute we can pay these boys is to dedicate ourselves anew to those concepts.

Our own enjoyment of freedom and democracy can only be achieved when the entire world is free and democratic. As long as any part of the world is enslaved, God's will is thwarted and we are endangered. We must always be alert and prepared against the threat of world enslavement. Once we fall asleep, some person or group of persons somewhere will try to enslave us.

The main bulwark of democracy is education, particularly along religious lines. When all the peoples of the world have learned to live by the lessons of the Bible, the day might come when our armed forces will be needed no longer.

Meanwhile, we must look to the United Nations to maintain the peace of the world. I said "peace." It is almost a mockery to utter the word today. Peace—in a world that knows no peace. Yet, as we believe in God, who rules the universe, peace must be the goal we strive for daily.

One way to attain that is to keep our country so strong militarily that no one will ever again dare attack us. The world must know that never again will there be a Pearl Harbor.

At the same time we must implement the United Nations with an international police force to prevent aggressive warfare on the part of any group or nation.

We have a police force in New York City, not because we are lawless, but because there are some amongst us who, either having never learned or having forgotten the commandments of God, must be restrained for the public good. So, too, with nations. Some have forgotten and others have never learned those commandments. They apply equally to nations and states and to men, for nations and states are merely aggregations of men. None are holier than the lowliest. Nations and states, like men, must be restrained when they stray from the path of God.

So, if we implement the United Nations with a police force, an army, a navy, and an air force, we will then have provided the world with a force that will prevent aggression—that will make enslavement impossible—that will maintain and further democracy under God—that will insure that the sacrifice of those heroes who gave their lives in the service of humanity that we and our descendants may be forever free will not have been futile.

Together, let us now offer up a silent prayer to Almighty God that he accept our dedication in the presence of these bodies, to His principles that will prevent a repetition of such occasions as this.

Farmers in Crookston, Minn., Area Annually Entertain Businessmen

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, I believe the farmers surrounding Crookston, Minn., my home city, have started a very interesting, helpful, and beneficial practice of annually inviting the business people of Crookston on a farm tour, ending it up with a dinner.

The usual practice is that the businessmen invite the farmers in for a harvest festival dinner, a farm-day luncheon, or something similar. Farmers are often invited into Crookston by the businessmen, but the farmers of that area now invite the businessmen out as their guests.

I believe this is a very nice custom, and, because of its unique character, I feel that readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will be interested in knowing more about the annual event. I can best tell the story and give the details by inserting into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a Crookston Daily Times article describing the tour, a letter to me, under date of August 5, from Carl G. Ash, county agent for West Polk County, Minn., an announcement from the Crookston Chamber of Commerce Bulletin for July 31, 1948, and a mimeographed instruction circular issued by the farmers who were sponsors of the tour.

The Crookston Daily Times article, dated July 20, follows:

FARMERS FETE BUSINESSMEN ON FIFTH ANNUAL FARM TOUR

Over 200 men—150 Crookston businessmen and 50 Crookston area farmers—attended the fifth annual farmer-sponsored farmers-businessmen tour of West Polk County farms yesterday.

This unique tour, designed to show businessmen what the farmers are doing and how they live, is the only one of its kind in the country.

Originally planned by farmers in this area, it has been managed by West Polk County Agent Carl Ash, who arranges for the places visited, gives a brief explanation at each stop, and generally answers the questions for both groups.

Ash said this year's tour was to show how the farmer's standard of living has been bettered in the Red River Valley, and how farmers now follow modern scientific planning in their work.

The first stop, at the home of Roseaire Boucher, north of Crookston, was to show a modern home on a farm. Ash explained the house and farm generally were run down when Boucher took it over in 1939.

Using materials and labor from Crookston, Ash said Boucher has completely modernized his house, with running water, electricity, septic tank, and a $5,000 completely modern kitchen.

Mrs. Boucher planned and designed the arrangement of the kitchen, Ash said, from plans she studied through home-project (extension service) lessons.

The Anchor Wurden farm west of Fisher was the next stop, where two crops and the results of spraying this year were shown.

The first stop was at a 40-acre wheatfield planted last year to sunflowers. As was later explained, sunflowers volunteer so badly the year after they have been planted that they could become a menace without controls.

The field shown had been, early this year, filled with sunflowers to the point that they would have crowded out the wheat, but by using a spray of 5⅓ ounces of 2.4–D acid of the ester formulation the flowers were almost eliminated.

The wheat stand now is heavy, with flowers showing only in a few places where there was a skip or nozzle plugging when the field was sprayed.

At another field, where sunflowers are planted alongside another field of wheat, the effect of drifting spray on the flowers is shown. Wurden had sprayed the adjoining wheat field, and wind drift blew the fumes over into the sunflower field.

The result was a number of abnormal sunflowers, many bearing a number of heads coming off the stalk rather than the normal one per stalk, at the top.

Some of the leaves were lighter in color where the spray had hit them, and others were stunted, but the main heads—and in some cases the abnormal heads lower down on the stalks—were about equal in size to those not touched by the spray.

This spray, which also cut out many weeds, particularly mustard, is what is needed, it was afterwards explained, in order to control sunflowers if they are to be introduced in the valley.

The flowers were first grown to any extent in this area last year, with Wurden joining a number of other farmers in trying out the crop. He reported he grossed about $125 per acre for his crop.

At the Norton Lien farm southwest of Crookston, Lien showed how he cleared 40 acres of former river-bottom land of trees by using a bulldozer to stump the area.

In 14½ minutes Lien pushed over a tree about 24 inches in diameter at the bottom, using a bulldozer entirely.

He cut the roots by depressing the dozer blade and going around and around the tree, working in closer all the time. Finally putting the blade up against the trunk, he pushed the tree over.

Most of the crowd, especially the farmers, were skeptical of the performance in the time Lien gave, 15 minutes, but the demonstration convinced them that it could be done.

Lien said one man, working 25 days, cleared all the trees off the 40-acre area with a big bulldozer and tractor, costing, together, $9,000.

More equipment was watched in action on the Ben Rohrer farm, south of Crookston. Rohrer has a new Graham-Hoeme plow, capable of plowing the heaviest sod or even a roadbed if sufficient power is used to pull it.

The plow, 30 feet wide and turning over 12 furrows, is capable of penetrating up to a foot. All the shares, which are curved loops of steel with small wings off the prong, are on an adjustable bar unit. The full swath of Rohrer's has three units.

The other implement demonstrated by Rohrer was an International Harvester toolbar, a deep-tilling cultivator particularly useful for summer fallowing.

The implement had a 12-foot swath. The value of the implement is that it makes a clean cut at the bottom, digs deeply, and has the individual sweeps, under ideal circumstances, meeting so that nothing is left as it pulls over a field.

On Rohrer's implement, there was a 10-inch spread between the ends of the shanks on each sweep, with the sweeps set a foot apart.

From that farm the tour continued to the one of Veral Gibbons, to show some more spraying effects. Gibbons had sprayed a flax field filled with mustard with a solution of the 2,4–D ester formulation using only 1.6 ounces of acid per acre.

The field was sprayed when the flax was about 2 to 4 inches high. As at the Wurden farm, the only signs of weeds in the heavy stand of flax was where the spray missed.

Where the spray missed the flax is a little taller, but Gibbons did not believe there would be any great difference in his final yield because of the spray.

Ash explained that normally 2 ounces or more of acid per acre are used to spray a field of the type shown.

A cornfield sprayed by Gibbons when the corn was lower than is recommended before spray is used was also shown. While there was a little twisting in the corn, most of the field appeared to be normal. The spray was used early because of the heavy stand of weeds at the time. Now, as Ash explained, it almost looks like a hand-hoed field.

The tour ended at the Gibbons farm with a steak dinner, provided by the farmer sponsors. The steak came from a purebred Hereford raised and fed by Gibbons.

After the meal Elmer Bredlie acted as toastmaster for a brief program, at which Carl Ash and Paul J. Miller, St. Paul, State extension director, spoke briefly.

The businessmen were welcomed by Elmer Ros, representing the farmers, and Adolph Ness and Clarence Barlow responded, representing the Crookston Chamber of Commerce.

Several selections were offered by the Community Star 4–H Club quintet, Donald Myrold, Donald and Kenneth Miller, Loren Erdman, and Bryant Ulseth.

The steaks were cooked on grates over an open bed of coals by Gibbons, Llye Kiel, William Albright, and Norton Lien.

The meals were served by the Our Saviour's Lutheran Ladies Aid. Women who assisted included Mrs. Al Bakke, Mrs. Kate Acker, Mrs. Gertrude Wentzel, Mrs. Rudy Erdman, Mrs. Vernon Peltier, Mrs. Charles Perry, Mrs. Norton Lien, Mrs. Veral Gibbons, Mrs. John Radke, Mrs. A. J. Anderson, and Mrs. Walter Morgan.

In his speech Miller suggested that farmers may have to return to more livestock raising in the future since there are indications the price of grain will not continue high and high Government support prices probably won't be maintained.

Ash pointed out that 87 years ago the same land over which the tour went sold for 3 cents an acre. "Now, thanks to REA and profitable farming practices, farmers have completely modern homes with all the conveniences normally associated with city homes, and land worth much more than 3 cents an acre," he said.

Herewith is the letter I received from the county agent under date of August 5, following my request for further information concerning the annual affair:

CROOKSTON, MINN., August 5, 1948.

Hon. HAROLD C. HAGEN,
Congress of the United States,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR HAROLD: The annual farmers-businessmen's tour came into being in 1944. It was originated by V. M. Gibbons and Walter Ross. Mr. Gibbons sounded out Mr. Ross and myself on the idea of inviting businessmen of the town on a tour of the countryside. Crops looked good and the businessmen were operating shorthanded and under considerable difficulty in obtaining goods. Mr. Gibbons said businessmen were being blamed for a lot of the shortages which they had no control over. Gasoline was rationed at the time, so he felt businessmen had very little idea of what the crop was like because they had no gas to drive around the country. He thought it would do them good to get away from their business and he also thought it was a good idea to let the businessmen know by this device that they didn't mean all the nasty things that had been said to them by farmers who were trying desperately to get needed supplies. He received full support on the idea.

The first two tours started at 7 o'clock. The first one ended at the Walter Ross farm at 9: 30 for a light lunch. The tour traveled out the south side of the river in Bygland township and ended at the Walter Ross farm. A field of corn that was being grown for hybrid seed was one of the outstanding things on this tour. For the first time many folks saw how hybrid corn was produced. The second tour showed a large flock of turkeys, hogs being raised on pasture and a lot of grain fields—and ended at the V. M. Gibbons' home for lunch. The return tour showed fields of peas grown for the first time in this area, the new Carlton variety of durum, beets being grown without any hand thinning and ended at the Lutheran Church at Eldred for supper—the feature of which was 1-inch-deep apple pie and big slices. The fourth tour featured mechanical harvesting of beets, cleaning brush out of ditches with bulldozers and sunflowers—and ended with a sweetcorn supper at Angus by the Presbyterian Ladies Aid. And you know what happened on the last one.

One of the things that has been appreciated by the guests has been the changing of cars at every stop. This has served to break up clicks and acquaint more people, plus the fun of wondering whom you are going to ride with next and who your companions are going to be.

Sincerely yours.

CARL G. ASH,
County Agent, West Polk County.

Prior to the tour, the Chamber of Commerce of Crookston published an announcement in its monthly publication, dated July 31. It follows:

[From Crookston Chamber of Commerce Bulletin of July 31, 1948]

TOUR

The fifth annual farm tour put on by the farmers in the Beltrami, Bygland, Crookston, Eldred, and Fisher areas, had its full quota of amazing and interesting features. Most crops gave promise of above-average yields. We are going to be interested in a number of fields visited, especially the Wurden field of wheat which followed the big sunflower crop produced last year, his 100-acre field of sunflowers, Gibbons' flax field which had been sprayed to kill weeds, as well as his cornfield also sprayed for weed elimination. It will be interesting to see Ben Rohrer's field next year where the Graham-Hoeme plow was demonstrated—Norton Lien's felling of the mighty oak in 15 minutes with his bulldozer was indeed an attraction. County Agent Ash knows his West Polk and certainly does arrange a most interesting tour. We have not forgotten the eats, the ice cream, cake, and coffee served in the early years of the tour at the Walter J. Ross and Verle Gibbons farms, the apple pie at Eldred after we had already been stuffed, the sweet corn and butter at Angus, and now those steaks at Verle Gibbons. Wonder what will be next year? Thanks for the invitation.

The mimeographed circular issued by farmers contained some interesting reading matter. It follows:

Good afternoon, folks.

We welcome you to the fifth annual farmers-businessmen's tour. We are pleased and complimented that you have taken time away from your business to attend this tour. Our purpose is to create between town and country a more thorough understanding of each other's problems. Contrary to some rumors the average farmer's back yard does not contain a quantity of buried tin cans full of money.

We purpose to show on this tour that the farmers of Polk County on the average are spending their gains to improve their standard of living.

FIRST STOP: ROSAIRE BOUCHER FARM

In 1939 Mr. and Mrs. Rosaire Boucher established their home on this farm. It had been operated by a tenant for many years and was badly run down. In the last 3 years Mr. and Mrs. Boucher have done a lot of modernizing to improve their home. They have installed running water. This was done by Crookston firms and workmen. They installed an oil furnace by a Crookston firm and workmen. They installed a sewage disposal system made by Crookston workmen and the plumbing was sold and installed by Crookston people. They completely wired their farm by Crookston firms and workmen. They have completely modernized their kitchen. Their built-in cupboards were made by Crox-workmen. Their linoleum was sold and installed by Crox people. None of these things show from the outside but they all cost in excess of $5,000. Keep in mind that farmers spend two kinds of money: gross and net. Net money only can be used for improving such as this. Mrs. Boucher completely planned her own kitchen from plans she got through extension home-project lessons.

SECOND STOP: ANCHOR WURDEN

This 40-acre wheatfield was in sunflowers last year. They volunteered so thickly this spring after the wheat was planted that they covered the ground. This field was sprayed with about 5⅓ ounces of 2,4–D acid of ester formulation about the 28th of June. There is no trace of the sunflowers in this field except where there was nozzle plugging or a skip.

THIRD STOP: ANCHOR WURDEN

The sunflowers on the west side of this field apparently show the effects of 2,4–D drifting out of the wheatfield to the west. The wheatfield was sprayed by ground sprayer with a northeast wind using about 5⅓ ounces of 2,4–D acid ester to the acre. Some time afterward the wind apparently from the southwest blew fumes back over to the sunflower field.

FOURTH STOP: NORTON LIEN

You see 40 acres of river bottom on which trees, large and small, have been cleared by one man that operated a bulldozer over a period of 25 days. This land will be put into wheat next year. The tractor and bulldozer cost $9,000. We are going to see a demonstration on how these big trees were taken out of this 40-acre land. Norton Lien, the owner of the farm, is operating the tractor.

FIFTH STOP: BEN ROHRER FARM

Many of you have heard the term "Graham-Hoeme plow," which is made in Texas. These cultivators are capable of staying in the ground even if they are crossing a road or going through the heaviest of sod, providing you have power to pull it. They are capable of penetrating to a depth of 10 or 12 inches or more. They have received an amazing reception the last 2 or 3 years from the farmer of the valley. You will also see a John Deere implement which has just come out. This is reported to be the first one in the immediate area.

SIXTH STOP: V. M. GIBBONS

You have heard much this year about using 2,4–D. You are going to see an oat, corn, and flax field that was sprayed with only 1.6 ounces of 2,4–D acid of the ester type. You can see what fine kills were obtained with that small amount of 2,4–D acid. Actually less than 30 cents' worth of aid to the acre. Notice in the flax field where the sprayer missed on a lap. Notice how weedy it is. Also that the flax is a little bit taller where it wasn't sprayed.

On the Bias—A Capable Congressman—As to Dewey Short

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DEWEY SHORT

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following three editorials: One, On the Bias, by G. Olds, that appeared in the Springfield (Mo.) News-Leader of July 18, 1948; one, A Capable Congressman, which appeared in the Joplin (Mo.) Globe of July 27, 1948; and another one, As to DEWEY SHORT, which also appeared in the Joplin Globe of August 1, 1948:

[From the Springfield (Mo.) News-Leader of July 18, 1948]

ON THE BIAS

Young Quentin Haden tells me solemnly that I am going to be the most surprised fellow in the Ozarks on the morning of Wednesday, August 4, when I wake up and discover that he is the Republican nominee for Congress from the Seventh District.

Mr. Haden is quite right. I will be as surprised as all get out if he succeeds in taking the nomination from the Honorable DEWEY SHORT.

I don't believe young Mr. Haden can do it. He is operating on the theory that Congressman SHORT is going to be beaten sometime—which undoubtedly is true—and that this is the year to beat him, which probably isn't true.

DEWEY SHORT has done a pretty good job of representing the seventh district and the argument that he has held his seat too long is a specious one. He has, of course, served a long time—now serving his eighth 2-year term covering a span of 20 years, since he was out a couple of terms—and he has grown in experience and wisdom and influence.

DEWEY SHORT's courage in voting his convictions on some of the gravest issues ever to face our country—a courage often demonstrating a complete indifference to his own political fate—is something to admire and envy.

DEWEY SHORT has dared to be an American when all about him men were preparing to give away their country and to assume intolerable and impossible burdens. DEWEY seems to think that one county in the Ozarks—or any one county in the U. S. A.—is more important than any state in Europe, Asia, or Africa. He is not, I guess, what you'd call world-minded.

Being world-minded has gotten the U. S. A. into a heck of a lot of trouble—and now seems likely to get us into some more. DEWEY would like to see his country go its own sweet and peaceful way. He would like to see the U. S. A. stop squandering billions of dollars in trying to promote a brand of democracy which suits us swell and which other countries could have for the asking—if they wanted it.

Since they don't want it, since they have demonstrated repeatedly that they have no use for democracy, he sees no sense in trying to force it down their throats and into their hearts.

Americans in high places have made it unpopular to admire democracy—things have come to such a pass that an American who feels a surge of patriotism, who wants to get up and shout hurray for the Star-Spangled Banner, such a fellow has to watch out that he isn't arrested for treason. He gets downright embarrassed.

DEWEY SHORT doesn't admit that embarrassment—doesn't even own it. If people want to call him provincial, that's all right with him—that fits quite nicely into the pattern of honesty and old-fashioned patriotism he has woven for himself.

I observed the other day that the Federals had censored some schoolbook because it pointed out how many schoolhouses could be built for the cost of one battleship. Such teaching is downright subversive, you know. Makes people think about the folly of war, the utter madness of the world into which we have been drugged and dragged.

I don't know whether or not DEWEY SHORT has used that incident in his speeches—but it would be just like him; it would be just like him not to care if he offended the War Department or the State Department or the Saint Nicholas department.

DEWEY, of course, is fighting a hopeless fight—in that sense, he is completely useless in Congress. But his very uselessness, his very indifference to almost anything but the welfare of America, gives him an unique position in Congress—because so few speak with him, his voice becomes the louder and the clearer.

For that reason, if for no other, I think there is a very definite place in Congress for DEWEY SHORT—a very real need of him—and the Ozarks should be proud of the distinction he earns for them. For the Ozarks to turn him out would be as foolish and disheartening as it would be to decree—Heaven forbid—that our trees should no longer burst into autumn flame, that our hills be flattened, that our streams run dry, that all our special flavor be drained away.

DEWEY SHORT is part of that special flavor, that special color which makes the Ozarks precious and distinctive, and his district would be destroying a rare and irreplaceable—albeit sometimes bewildering—asset if it ventured to substitute a less distinctive individual.

I realize, of course, that I probably am getting needlessly worked up—not to mention the fact that we of Springfield cannot vote for or against Mr. SHORT. But it just seemed to me that somebody ought to come out in favor of some of the things he stands for. Or, perhaps I should say, some of the things he stands against.

I do not have the nerve or the talent to speak for America as DEWEY SHORT has spoken for her—and I am sure I would have even less nerve and talent if I occupied a precarious seat in Congress—but I certainly would like to endorse what he has said—and I would like to see his district endorse his sentiments.

I have little doubt that it will. (G. Olds.)

[From the Joplin (Mo.) Globe of July 27, 1948]

A CAPABLE CONGRESSMAN

The voters of this congressional district, who have been sending DEWEY SHORT to Congress with monotonous regularity for a good many years, can be counted on to repeat again next November because there obviously is even more reason for sending him to Washington this time than in any previous campaign.

One major argument, of course, is the fact that Representative SHORT is the ranking Republican member of the important Committee on Military Affairs in the lower House, and will become its chairman if Republican control of Congress is continued next year, as almost certainly will be the case. Committee chairmen have great power in promoting desirable legislation or in slowing up the progress of proposed laws not so certainly needed or wanted.

A more general, but perhaps even more cogent argument, is the fact that DEWEY SHORT, who is now serving his eighth 2-year term in Congress, has become increasingly capable as a Member of the National Legislature. With the background of a fine education, obtained in the United States and abroad, his years of experience at Washington have added greatly, not to his desire to be a good representative of the people of this district in Washington, because he had that desire from the day he first took the oath of office, but to his ability to perform the duties of a Congressman in a manner at once satisfactory to the folks at home and to the Nation at large.

DEWEY SHORT is not as much of an internationalist as some of the more radical internationalists would like. He admits to a stubborn belief that just one county in the Ozarks is in his estimation more important than any state in Europe, Asia, or Africa. To that extent he concedes he is provincial. But this is a weakness, if you want to call it that (and mighty few in his home district would), which is at least easy to forgive. After he completed an 18,000-mile European trip 2 years ago he came home convinced it was common sense for the United States to help restore that war-wrecked land. In that conclusion the Nation at large has concurred. But the people who accept it, including DEWEY SHORT, don't feel it means we of the United States ought to extend our donations to the point of weakening our important ability to take care of ourselves should serious trouble come, as it did at Pearl Harbor, or to the extent of reducing our ability to help the world.

If every voter in this district could have the opportunity of hearing Representative SHORT make a serious address during his present visit to his home community, his reelection by an increased majority would be overwhelmingly assured. No one in his audience is ever left with any doubt as to his sound, level-headed Americanism, nor as to his outstanding ability, both as a public speaker and as a student of the modern world and its multitudinous perplexing problems.

[From the Joplin (Mo.) Globe of August 1, 1948]

AS TO DEWEY SHORT

Tuesday's primary offers an interesting and important test for the Republican voters of the Seventh Congressional District of Missouri. DEWEY SHORT, now serving his eighth 2-year term as the district's Representative at Washington, has two active rivals for the nomination, and while the vote itself may not be close, at least the campaign has been vigorous. Two or three points having to do with this campaign seem to the Globe as worthy of consideration.

It certainly is true, for one thing, that no one person has a life grip on the job of representing his district in Congress. Any adult citizen has a perfect right to try for the honor, this year or any year, when a Representative is to be chosen.

For another thing, there is no reason to believe a news story referring to Quentin Haden, one of the candidates, as a war veteran when he isn't, was a deliberate intent to deceive and unjustifiably win support from former servicemen. Mr. Haden himself had previously stated in a public address that he is not a war veteran.

Concerning the argument of the supporters of DEWEY SHORT that he should be returned to Congress because his experience, knowledge of how to get things done, acquaintance, and the seniority which would advance him to the chairmanship of the important Armed Forces Committee at the next session of Congress would make him worth far more to this district than any newly elected Representative, the Globe already has expressed itself. At this time we invite the attention of Republicans of the district to the opinion of a real expert on Congress, an outstanding member of their own party, the late James E. Watson, of Indiana, who died in Washington last Thursday at the age of 84.

Senator Watson was elected to Congress at the age of 30 and served there, part of the time in the House and part of the time in the Senate, under 12 Presidents. In 1936 his memoirs were published in a book titled "As I Knew Them." Early in this book he had this to say regarding the value of experience in Congress:

"Length of service gives experience and without experience a man merely counts one on the roll call. A district that sends a man to Congress only one, or even two terms, had just about as well not send him at all."

By way of proving this statement he cited this incident:

"How they dealt with us newcomers may be very well illustrated by the following bit from my personal experience. I had not been in the House long when Mr. Champ Clark, who became one of my rarest friends, was delivering a speech and made an assertion that I thought should be challenged. He had been having one of those rapid-fire debates in which he liked so well to indulge and in which he was thoroughly at home. I rose and asked the privilege of interrupting him, but lightning-quick he said: 'I am dealing with the upperclassmen now. I'll get to the freshman class later on,' whereupon everybody had a good laugh at my expense, and I sat down somewhat perturbed. After he had closed his speech, I arose and again propounded my question, but he waved me aside with his arms, saying: 'The young Member from Indiana should learn that when the storm is over there is no use to try to revive the wind.' "

If our affairs with Russia should worsen, there certainly is a possibility that a part of our inevitable heavy national military expenditures would land in the Seventh District. Would this result be as likely with a freshman representative as with what Senator Watson called an upperclassman such as DEWEY SHORT now is?

Later in his book, Senator Watson offered more comment on a subject, much of which is eternally timely. From a man who served as whip for his party in the lower House and, later, as majority leader in the Senate, it deserves the consideration of thoughtful Republicans of this district when they go to the polls next Tuesday.

"People have a peculiar conception about electing a man to Congress. If anyone interested in a factory wanted to get someone to run it, he would not go out on the street and pick up Tom, Dick, or Harry to do it, but he would spend whatever time might be necessary to hunt up the most competent and skilled person available. The same is true of every other business, except that of running our Government, the greatest business in the world.

"For this inestimably delicate and important task people seem to think that just anybody picked up anywhere will do, though such an individual may never have had the slightest experience in running anything.

"All a candidate need do, it would seem, is to go about and ballyhoo, and in loud and raucous tones tell what he is going to do when he 'gets down to Washington'—swat the successful, sympathize with the unfortunate, and let it go at that. Such a campaign usually brings success in days of stress, just when the people should be looking for the strongest, soundest, and most solid men to represent them.

"On the other hand, we often hear it said, when a man of long experience is a candidate: 'We have had enough of him'—as though the people could ever have enough of the ability of a man who knows how.

"I repeat here, as I have exhorted elsewhere the best thing a district can do is to select some honest man with approved ability and in harmony with the politics of the district, send him to Congress and keep him there just as long as he is willing to serve. That alone brings experience, and experience is by all odds the most valuable asset a legislator may possess, save honor alone."

It should not be necessary to add that saying DEWEY SHORT should receive this renomination by an overwhelming majority is in nowise a reflection on the ability or character of his opponents. It is simply that the inexorable commonsense of the situation points to him as the prudent and logical choice.

My Pledges and How I Fulfilled Them

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, during my campaign for election last year, I told my constituents my political philosophy and what they could expect of me if I were elected to represent them in the House of Representatives. They elected me with an overwhelming majority of the votes cast.

I believe that I kept my every promise and more. I think I have the right to assume that my constituents approve my conduct and my voting record here because this year the Republican Party and the Liberal Party, as well as the Democratic Party—the only party in which I have ever been enrolled—have unanimously designated me as their candidate to succeed myself.

Nevertheless, I think I should here record my pledges and how I fulfilled them.

LABOR

During my campaign, I said:

I favor a broad social-security program including old-age pensions, unemployment insurance, security for crippled and dependent children, and the blind.

I will support a legislative program which will endeavor to establish fair-employment practices and prohibit discrimination in employment.

Risk capital, new enterprise, and the development of our natural resources must be encouraged. Small business must be promoted. Competitive private enterprise free from control by monopolies, cartels, or any arbitrary private or public authority must be continued.

The Taft-Hartley law is bad for the reasons stated by President Truman in his veto message to Congress. As pointed out by the President, it invites "conflict between the National Labor Relations Board and its general counsel." Furthermore, it puts the employer in a position where he can refuse to bargain with his employees. In fact, it puts him in the anomalous position of being able to choose the workers' bargaining agent.

By the simple expedient of refusing to bargain with his employees the employer can force a strike.

While the men are on strike the employer can replace them with other workers of his own choosing and then call for an election of the bargaining agent to represent the workers. At that election the strikers who were replaced will be deprived of the right to vote, with the result that the bargaining agent selected will be representative of the employer rather than the employee, whom it is supposed to represent.

I favor increasing the minimum wages now fixed by law to a sum that will more closely approach the realities of present-day cost of living.

During my incumbency I urged broadening the social-security laws. I opposed legislation attempting to limit and to emasculate the social-security laws. I urged extended benefits under the unemployment insurance laws. I urged and voted for increased compensation for the lower-income Federal employees, including postal workers. I repeatedly pointed out the advantages of the New York State Fair Employment Practices Act as reasons for enactment of a similar national law. I urged enactment of a law increasing minimum wages. Nothing was done about the Taft-Hartley law because the Labor Committee could not be induced to take any action with reference thereto. I voted against weakening the antitrust laws.

TAXATION

During my campaign, I said:

Our tax laws must be adapted to an expanding peacetime economy having in mind, however, that tax cuts must go first to the low-income groups. This should be accomplished by increasing the tax exemption granted to all taxpayers. By doing that the low-income earner may get complete tax exemption. At the same time the man in the higher brackets will get an equal advantage. It will be fair to all while at the same time helping those who need it most. I also favor the enactment of a law which will grant the same income-tax privileges to all married people throughout the country, regardless of whether they live in a so-called community-property State or not. It is rank absurdity to permit a man and wife in one State, by the simple expediency of changing their residence to another State, to obtain tax advantages under our Federal income-tax laws. The situation can be remedied only by Federal legislation.

During my incumbency, I urged enactment of tax legislation to effectuate my promises. That part putting all our citizens on an equal basis as to so-called community property has been enacted into law. I opposed the tax bill submitted and voted to sustain the presidential veto of that bill because it unfairly gave the largest tax cuts to those best able to pay and gave the smallest cuts to those least able to pay. About 70 percent of the tax cut was given to about 6 percent of our taxpayers. Ninety-four percent of our taxpayers received only 30 percent of the tax cut. Bills which I introduced to broaden the tax exemption base, to eliminate inequalities, to exempt pensions, and to eliminate wartime nuisance taxes failed of enactment.

HOUSING

During my campaign, I said:

The Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill should have long since been enacted into law. It should be passed at the earliest possible moment. The Government must do everything possible to encourage and aid private industry in relieving the housing shortage by the building of permanent homes for all those who need them.

During my incumbency, I fought continuously for adequate housing legislation. My first official act, after taking my oath of office, was to sign the petition to bring the Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill before the House for debate and for a vote. My effectiveness was increased by my election to the Committee on Banking and Currency which had this legislation before it. My efforts are reflected by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and were publicized by the press.

PRICE AND RENT CONTROL

During my campaign, I said:

Control of the price to be paid for any commodity, whether it be the use of property or the purchase of food, clothing, or anything else, can be justified only as the use of police power in an emergency. That the emergency has existed and still exists cannot be denied as to both food and rents. Some relief may be obtained by the enactment of rent-control statutes by the various States. Such local control can be made effective by proper legislation and by proper administration. Houses cannot be moved across State lines to avoid such local legislation.

Foodstuffs, however, must be controlled on a national scale. They cannot be controlled locally. If we were to have local legislation fixing prices in one community, the producers could beat the law by the simple expedient of sending their merchandise to communities that do not have such restrictions.

I am in complete agreement with President Truman's policy of attempting to solve the situation by voluntary discipline. If that does not solve the problem, then price control will be the only way out. It will be the last resort if the emergency continues.

During my incumbency I introduced a comprehensive price-control bill and repeatedly urged enactment of price-control legislation, but my pleadings fell upon deaf ears. The efforts of my colleagues who joined with me in urging effective rent-control legislation was only slightly more effective. A weak, but better than none at all, rent-control bill was enacted after long and arduous debate. By the dint of almost superhuman effort, a provision which would have made the entire bill unconstitutional was eliminated. I also introduced a bill to control fuel during emergencies.

FOREIGN POLICY

During my campaign I said:

I have been preaching the establishment of a Jewish homeland in Palestine since 1921. The President and the Democratic Party favor the opening of Palestine to unrestricted Jewish immigration and colonization and the establishment there of a free and democratic Jewish commonwealth.

We favor the majority report of the United Nations Special Committee on Palestine as the best means presently available to solve the problem. We urge the immediate implementation of the program there advanced.

The Communist Daily Worker and its American Labor Party candidate opposing me in this campaign have attacked me as a warmonger, not because I have talked out against their beloved Russia, but because I have dared to talk out in support of the American democratic way of life. These are my principles, and these are the principles which they find fault with:

In order that the world may not again be drenched in blood by international outlaws and criminals we must "join with the other United Nations in the establishment of an international organization based on the principle of the sovereign equality of all peace-loving States, open to membership by all such States, large and small, for the prevention of aggression and the maintenance of international peace and security." To "make all necessary and effective agreements and arrangements through which the nations would maintain adequate forces to meet the needs of preventing war and of making impossible the preparation for war and which would have such forces available for joint action when necessary.

"Such organization must be endowed with power to employ armed forces when necessary to prevent aggression and preserve peace.

"We favor the maintenance of an international court of justice, of which the United States shall be a member, and the employment of diplomacy, conciliation, arbitration, and other like methods, where appropriate, in the settlement of international disputes.

"World peace is of transcendent importance."

The quotation is from the Democratic national platform of 1944. Those were my sentiments then—they are my sentiments now. President Truman and my party have reasserted them time and time again. We will deal with Russia and everyone else around the peace table. We will do all in our power to prevent war. If Russia and the Russians want communism they can have it and we will do nothing to change their minds about it, provided they keep it to and for themselves.

By the same token we want none of their Communist ideology here and we will do all in our power to keep it out of this country.

When Hitler and Stalin had a peace treaty the Communists and their fellow travelers in this country were most vociferous in their demands that we be isolationists and send neither food nor munitions to Britain or France. At that time the Munich appeasement was applauded and Hitler's attack upon the rest of Europe was an imperialistic war by the countries attacked.

When Hitler ignored his peace treaty and attacked Russia this same group found that the imperialistic war was a people's war and they could not get our boys and supplies over fast enough.

Thank God they were in time and Hitler and his murderous hordes were eliminated.

During those days there were no insults by the Vishinskys and the Molotovs. Parenthetically I might ask: Has Litvinov, who did so much to bring about friendly relations between the United States and Russia been liquidated because he was foolish enough to think that the Russians intended to do all the amicable and peace-loving things that he preached while we were fighting together.

There is only one way to preserve our American heritage and our American birthright, and that is to at all times be so militarily strong that no one will dare attack us. The world must know that never again will we be in a position where any aggressor nation can pull a Pearl Harbor on us.

If that is warmongering, I am willing that my name be placed alongside of those of Franklin D. Roosevelt, Harry S. Truman, James Byrnes, George Marshall, Averell Harriman, and David Lilienthal.

The Marshall plan to relieve the dire need and distress of a stricken world must be put into effect at the earliest possible moment.

That, even faster than military might, will stop the Communist hordes in their tracks.

During my incumbency, I worked assiduously to enact into reality the things I preached during all my adult life.

The establishment of the free state of Israel became a reality. It has been and will continue to be aided in every respect by every freedom-loving American. Our Government will soon give Israel full and complete recognition; it will give Israel all the aid that a friendly ally is entitled to; it will soon receive a $100,000,000 loan from our country. My efforts in connection with all thereof, which are still continuing, I prefer not to record at this time. In due time, others may see fit to tell about them.

I am proud of my vote in support of the Marshall plan, now known as the European recovery plan, and I am proud of my vote to eliminate from the House version of that bill aid to Franco Spain.

My vote in favor of selective service—the draft—was not only dictated by my conscience and my belief that it was in the best interests of peace, but it was in accordance with my pledge to my constituents during my campaign. I lived through two World Wars. My older son served overseas in World War II. My younger son is subject to the new law I supported. I feel as deeply as any the waste of money and manpower for military purposes. But just as we would not vote to disband a municipal police force, we must insist on a national and an international police force.

I fought for a fair displaced-persons bill and opposed the discriminatory and unfair provisions of the bill as it was passed.

I introduced a bill to permit adopted children to enter our country free of quota restrictions.

I introduced a bill to sever all relations with Lebanon.

I introduced a bill to withhold from Britain and all other countries the equivalent of the moneys they were lending and/or giving to the Arab aggressor nations.

I introduced a bill to investigate conditions in Palestine.

I introduced a bill to exempt from penal prosecution all Americans who enlisted in the army of Israel.

I introduced a bill calling for limitation of the veto power in the United Nations.

I introduced a bill to improve the Veterans' Administration.

SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES

During my campaign, I said:

I condemn the tactics of the Un-American Activities Committee in pillorying men and destroying reputations without giving the accused an opportunity to be heard.

During my incumbency, I did not hesitate to make my stand known. I actively opposed with all my energy the enactment of the Mundt-Nixon bill. At the same time, I gave no comfort to the Communists and their fellow travelers and to totalitarianists, no matter what name they used. Nevertheless, I opposed and voted against giving any funds to the Un-American Activities Committee.

MISCELLANEOUS

I could write volumes on my activities on behalf of my constituents who needed help. I will leave that story to be told by those who called upon me from time to time.

Anyone and everyone who called upon me received a respectful hearing. One thing I did not and never will permit is to allow anyone, individual or delegation of individuals, to call upon me under false colors, using high-sounding but misleading names. Whenever they do, I will expose them for what they are.

Those who desire a more detailed record of my activities will find my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD under the following subjects on the pages indicated:

Politics Is the Answer to Red Smear by GOP

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I read with a great deal of interest an article by Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt appearing in the Washington Daily News of August 3, 1948, entitled "Politics Is the Answer to Red Smear by GOP." Mrs. Roosevelt frankly gives her reaction to the loyalty and spy investigations undertaken at this time by the Republican congressional investigating committees. To me, it is plain that the Republicans have instigated these investigations and are trying to make communism an issue of the campaign because they do not want the people to realize that they have legislated for the benefit of the special and vested interests and failed to act or pass legislation in the interest of the common people, for instance, about high prices, controlling inflation, and to provide decent and low-cost housing. Mrs. Roosevelt's article is as follows:

MY DAY

(By Eleanor Roosevelt)

POLITICS IS THE ANSWER TO RED SMEAR BY GOP

HYDE PARK, Monday.—I have been very much interested by the sudden interest taken in the testimony of Elizabeth T. Bentley, the self-confessed wartime Soviet spy.

It appears as if the subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, finds this an opportune time to present the fantastic story of this evidently neurotic lady. In some way it may be useful to the Republican Party, though I cannot imagine how it can serve any really useful purpose.

It seems that all that she has to tell has already been told, by her own accounts, to the Federal Bureau of Investigation in New Haven in the summer of 1945. I understand that when certain people tried to verify whether authorities actually had been able to prove any of the things that she stated as suspicious, no proof was forthcoming. It seems to me quite outrageous to use this method of smearing people when you cannot produce proof.

For instance, to testify that a reputable person like Laughlin Currie, whom the lady admits she never saw and has no proof of any kind against him, has furnished her with confidential information can only serve to make those who do not know him wonder if there isn't some tangible proof. The natural question to ask is why should so-called reputable people want to injure entirely innocent individuals?

The answer, it seems to me, is politics and the chance to make the limelight and whip up a little more excitement for vigilance in this country on the part of the Un-American Activities Committee. Whether they make people suffer unjustifiably in so doing seems to be of no more importance, except to those among us who believe the Constitution protects us against such goings-on. We begin to think that the methods we condemn under other forms of government are coming perilously near to being used by certain of our own representatives.

As for Miss Bentley, one can only regard her with regret and pity. She is probably an intelligent young woman. She graduated from Vassar College, so she must have had some brains, and for some reason what she is doing now must seem to her worth while. The reason, however, is somewhat obscure, so far as I am concerned. In the future I should think it might be difficult for her to find any acquaintances who would be willing to say even "good morning" and "good evening" to her. That might be construed as a means to involve them in some new and fantastic trial.

Comprehensive Social-Security Revision

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EUGENE D. MILLIKIN

OF COLORADO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement I have prepared on social-security revision.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The President's message to this special session urged, among many other things, that the Congress during the 2 weeks' period which he had envisioned as sufficiently lengthy for the legislative completion of all of his projects should increase the benefits under the old-age and survivors insurance system and extend the coverage of the system to the millions of workers who have never been covered since the enactment of the Social Security Act in 1935.

The special session did not accommodate the President because there was not time to finish the extensive work on the subject already in progress, to hear the numerous witnesses who were entitled to be heard, to reach committee decisions, to draft the necessary legislation, to prepare reports, and to debate in Congress the controversial issues.

There would not have been sufficient time had the entire session been devoted exclusively to that single purpose.

As we shall see by examination of only a part of the problems to be considered in reviewing and revising our social-security system, compliance by the Congress with the President's recommendation would have called for reckless, ill-considered improvisation of legislation which by its nature and scope would have the most fateful social, political, and economic consequences. To have complied would have been an act of shameful irresponsibility.

If the President's suggestion was motivated by personal partisan reasons, and candor requires, we regret to say, that the possibility of this is not precluded, he is reminded of the fact that the existing social-security law has been in effect for 13 years, that its defects have been a matter of mounting revelation every day of all that period of time, and that the present Republican control of Congress has been in effect for less than 2 years.

We shall give no further attention to the partisan implications of the President's request except to state a few facts which will make it clear and bring reassurance that narrow partisanship has had no part in the Senate's active and intelligent progress in the matter.

About a year ago, on July 23, 1948, the United States Senate passed a resolution sponsored jointly by Senator GEORGE, former Democratic chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, and by the junior Senator from Colorado, Mr. MILLIKIN, the present Republican chairman of that committee, directing the Senate Finance Committee "to make a full and complete investigation of old-age and survivors insurance and all other aspects of the existing social-security program, particularly in respect to coverage, benefits, and taxes relating thereto. * * *"

It will be noted that the initiation of the subject was bipartisan. The resolution was adopted on a bipartisan basis—it was unanimously approved. The Senate Finance Committee proceeded to carry out the terms of the resolution and in its deliberations on the subject there has never been a partisan division.

The significance of this is sharpened by noting the membership of the committee which is as follows:

Democrat: WALTER F. GEORGE, Georgia; ALBEN W. BARKLEY, Kentucky; TOM CONNALLY, Texas; HENRY FLOOD BYRD, Virginia; EDWIN C. JOHNSON, Colorado; SCOTT W. LUCAS, Illinois.

By the express terms of its resolution the Senate mandated a comprehensive rather than a piecemeal handling of the job. The Members of the Senate, as do those of the Senate Committee on Finance, and as does every person having any knowledge at all of what it is about, knows that every part of the program—old-age and survivors' insurance, public assistance, unemployment compensation—is related to and has important repercussions on every other part and that a piecemeal approach is apt to set patterns and precedents destructive of sound, overall solutions. That is why the Congress has refused to nibble at the subject during the special session.

We add that no member of the Senate Finance Committee, of the majority or minority, has requested that piecemeal action be taken during the special session.

During the summer recess last year following the adoption of this resolution, the Senate Finance Committee organized a special advisory council to give the Committee on Finance the benefit of its recommendations.

Every member of that council was selected with the approval of the minority members of the Finance Committee. Great care was taken to secure widespread geographical representation, to secure as members men and women of high standing, broad experience, and especially qualified to protect the interests of the worker, the employer, and the public.

A similar council had rendered invaluable services in the formulation of the present law. That earlier council and the helpfulness of its work furnished the precedent for the present one.

Ernest C. Young, dean of the graduate school, Purdue University, West Lafayette, Ind.; member, International Conference of Agricultural Economists; member, American Association of Farm Managers and Rural Appraisers; past president, American Farm Economic Association.

The chairman is Hon. Edward R. Stettinius, Jr., and the associate chairman is Dr. Sumner H. Slichter.

Four of the members—Messrs. Stettinius, Brown, Folsom, and Linton—served on the earlier council.

A preparatory committee of the council met in October and again in November of last year to make the necessary preparations for the organization of a technical staff and for the first full meeting of the council. The first council meeting took place on December 4 and 5, when the council began consideration of the problems before it.

The council, its members assembling from all parts of the country, has met for two full days each month from last December through May of this year and its steering committee, designated by the council at its first meeting, has met for one full day between each of the council meetings. Average attendance at council meetings has been 15 from the 17 members. Between meetings the members have analyzed and studied background and research material prepared by the council's professional research staff under the direction of the steering committee.

The first report of the council was presented to the Committee on Finance on April 15. This report, which is printed as Senate Document 149, recommends 22 important changes in the old-age and survivors insurance program. It was followed on May 20 by a report, printed as Senate Document 162, proposing that the old-age and survivors insurance program be enlarged to embrace provisions for permanent and total disability insurance.

These reports, together with the council's report just in hand on the public-assistance programs and a later report to come on unemployment insurance, will present the council's conclusions regarding feasible provisions for governmental protection from want, dependency, unemployment, and the hazard of disability.

It has been possible for this widely representative group of persons to make unanimous recommendations on most of the important points they have considered, and to make nearly unanimous recommendations on the remainder. Their reports will be of great assistance to the Finance Committee and to the Congress. They are being widely distributed and studied, are focusing attention on the issues, and will promote full presentation of all viewpoints at the later committee hearings.

The council has been able to do so much in such a relatively short time, considering the complexity of the issues, only because it was able to build on the foundation of an exhaustive study completed by a technical staff for the House Ways and Means Committee in 1946. Its 742-page report, called Issues in Social Security and prepared under House Resolution 204, was furnished to the members of the council at the beginning of their study. The material in this report has been continually supplemented and brought up to date throughout the council's study through the work of the council's technical staff.

The council has also drawn on the technical resources of the Social Security Administration and the Treasury Department and has carefully considered statements prepared by many interested groups and individuals. Letters from the public have also been helpful in pointing up areas in which recommendations should be made.

As the advisory council has strongly emphasized, approach to revision of the act should be a comprehensive one if an effective and well-coordinated program for social security is to result. For illustration of the dependence of many revisions upon one change, note this statement by the advisory council:

"If coverage is not broadly extended the council would propose very different modifications in the present provisions for insured status, benefit structure, method of determining the average monthly wage, and financing."

Some of the issues which the advisory council has had to consider in its review of the related social-security programs and which may come before the committee and the Congress are these:

What is the proper role of social-insurance and public-assistance programs in a social-security system?

Should a means-test system be substituted for the present insurance system?

Should a pension system paying flat benefits from the general treasury be substituted for social insurance?

Should benefits under social insurance be geared to wages or should they be the same for all?

To what extent should persons under the insurance program "pay their own way?"

Should the Government eventually pay part of the costs of the system out of general taxation?

Is it feasible and desirable to extend coverage to self-employed persons such as business and professional people and farm operators?

How can earnings reports best be secured from the self-employed?

Is it feasible to secure income reports from all 11,000,000 persons with some self-employment during the year?

Should the self-employed be charged the single employee rate, the combined employer-employee rate, or something in between?

Is it desirable to extend coverage to employees of nonprofit organizations?

Should the government compel coverage in this traditionally tax-exempt area?

Should all employees of nonprofit organizations be covered, including clergymen and members of religious orders?

Is it feasible and desirable to extend coverage to agricultural and domestic workers?

Is it feasible to get wage reports for these groups? Through a stamp system or list reporting?

Can the value of wages-in-kind for this group be evaluated?

Is it desirable to extend coverage to Federal employees?

Are short-term workers who leave government after a few years and return to employment covered by old-age and survivors insurance adequately protected by the existing combination of civil-service retirement and old-age and survivors insurance?

If coverage under old-age and survivors insurance were extended to Federal workers, should the civil-service system be modified; and if so, how?

Is it desirable to extend coverage to railroad workers?

Are workers who move between railroad employment and employment now covered under old-age and survivors insurance adequately protected under present arrangements?

Should old-age and survivors insurance coverage be extended to the armed services?

What should be considered the serviceman's wage?

Should the serviceman contribute directly to the program?

Is it desirable to cover employees of State and local governments?

If so, how can it be done in the light of constitutional barriers against Federal taxation of other governmental units?

Should employees of proprietary units of State and local governments be covered on a compulsory basis?

How can voluntary provisions be designed to guard against adverse selection?

What should be the relation of old-age and survivors insurance to other plans for retirement, private or governmental?

Should tips and gratuities be counted as wages?

How should the rights of World War II veterans be protected under the program?

If presently excluded groups are brought into the system, how should the eligibility requirements be modified so that the new groups are not unduly handicapped in getting benefits?

Are the present eligibility requirements the best possible ones for the presently covered groups?

In light of the fact that they cannot contribute for long periods of time, should older workers get benefits higher in amount than what they and their employers pay for?

How should such benefits be financed? By an eventual contribution from general taxation? By pay-roll contributions made by younger workers and their employers?

What should the level of benefits be? How should the individual benefits be determined?

Up to what level of wages should contributions be assessed?

Should the program pay the full rate of benefits now or should the amount of benefits automatically increase over the years?

Should regular contributors receive higher benefits than intermittent contributors?

How should the benefit provisions be modified to overcome the handicap under which newly covered workers would otherwise find themselves?

Are the types of monthly benefits now provided the correct ones and should any new beneficiaries be added?

Are the age conditions and other eligibility conditions correct?

Are the present minimum and maximum provisions satisfactory or should they be changed?

Should benefits be paid to workers over 65 who have not retired?

What is a reasonable test of retirement?

Is the funeral benefit properly designed?

What is the cost of the various possible recommendations, now and in the future?

What should the contribution rate be?

What should the contribution schedule be?

Should the system be financed on a full reserve basis?

What is the meaning of the reserve?

Should the risk of permanent and total disability be added to the Federal system of old-age and survivors insurance or should loss of income from this cause be handled entirely under public assistance?

If the latter, should a new special State-Federal assistance category be set up?

If the former, how can the protection be provided without undue risk to the solvency of the fund?

What eligibility requirements should be established to prevent persons from qualifying who have not really suffered a wage loss?

What should be the definition of permanently and totally disabled?

Should the definition cover all such disability or only those which result in economic incapacity?

Should the economic incapacity be for the person's usual occupation or for all gainful activity?

Should the definition cover only medically demonstrable disabilities?

Should the definition include a prognosis of long-continued and indefinite duration or should it cover all total disabilities that have lasted for some fixed period of time such as 6 months?

What level of benefits may be safely paid without interfering with incentives to return to work when able?

What provisions should be set up for the rehabilitation of beneficiaries?

How should this rehabilitation be financed?

How should such a new program be administered? As a separate system or as part of old-age and survivors insurance?

How much would such a program cost?

How should such a program be integrated with workmen's compensation and Federal disability insurance systems?

Should categories such as old-age assistance, aid to dependent children, and aid to the blind, be retained in the State-Federal assistance program?

Should all income continue to be counted in determining need, or should exemptions be allowed?

Up to what level of State payments should the Federal Government be willing to match?

What should be the method of Federal financial participation?

Should the rate of Federal participation vary with the per capita income of the State or with the level of benefits paid?

Should the Federal Government participate in the program for children to the same extent as it does for the aged and the blind?

Should the Federal Government participate in general assistance?

Should the Federal Government participate in medical-care payments made on behalf of assistance recipients?

Should the Federal Government participate in assistance to aged persons residing in medical institutions?

Are the Federal standards which the States must now meet to get Federal financial help the correct ones?

What should residence requirements be, if any?

What is the cost of the present system and of various proposals?

Can, and will, the costs be reduced by the social-insurance program?

What has been the relation of social insurance and public assistance in the past, and what should it be in the future?

How far should coverage in unemployment insurance be extended?

Is it practical to include farm laborers, household workers, and self-employed individuals under unemployment insurance?

How should individuals who move from State to State, or from railroad to nonrailroad employment, be handled under unemployment insurance?

What should be done about veterans' benefits and those of men who will be drafted?

Should the Federal Government establish a separate unemployment system for its own employees or utilize the various State plans?

What provisions under unemployment insurance should be made for workers who exhaust insurance rights in time of severe depressions?

Should temporary disability payments be incorporated with all unemployment-insurance laws?

What would be the advantages of workers' contributions to unemployment insurance?

What are the advantages and limitations of the present methods of experience rating?

What, if any, Federal standards are needed for eligibility, benefits, or disqualification rules?

How high should benefits be in relation to wage loss and need?

How might benefits be related to increasing cost of living?

Should the size of benefits vary with the family status, as is done in old-age and survivors insurance?

How far should the Federal Government go in continuing to supervise administrative expenditures?

Should all funds collected for unemployment insurance be set aside for such purposes only?

What provisions should be established for reinsurance or Federal loans to States, in case the State reserves are exhausted?

What sort of a tax program could be devised to minimize rather than accentuate cyclical unemployment?

These questions have been set out so that anyone reading them can see how utterly inappropriate and how negligent of duty it would be to attempt to deal with them and to find solutions in the 2 weeks' period of a special session as suggested by the President.

Let us pursue this a little further by considering some of the economic implications.

In these days, when a $250,000,000,000 gross national product is a near reality, when 60,000,000 jobs are spoken of as a "floor" instead of a "ceiling," when production is strained beyond physical capacity—one might expect benefit payments to the unemployed to be small in their sum and the recipients of these benefits limited in number. And they are, considering what may be expected in a time of recession.

In the fiscal year ending June 30, 1948, a year of 61,000,000 jobs, nearly 4,000,000 beneficiaries were paid three-quarters of a billion dollars of unemployment benefits. In addition $67,000,000 were expended out of Federal revenues for the administration of State unemployment insurance programs and $147,000,000 were paid out of the general revenues for interest on that part of the public debt held in the unemployment reserve account.

Under the public-assistance programs of the present Social Security Act, approximately 3,580,000 needy persons—aged, blind, dependent children—lacking the resources with which to supply for themselves the minimums of living, are on today's public assistance rolls.

Within the fiscal year ended June 30 the Federal Government contributed out of the general revenues toward their relief $680,000,000 and forty-three million more toward support of the State administrative agencies serving them. Matching contributions added by the States to the Federal payments, together with State disbursements for general relief in fiscal 1948, raised the total disbursements from public funds for relief of the needy to well over a billion and a half dollars.

In the past fiscal year the—now—least of the major social-security programs in terms of number of beneficiaries and cost, although in ultimate effect the greatest—the old-age and survivors insurance program—provided benefits amounting to $500,000,000 to approximately 2,162,000 persons. These benefits were paid independently of need to persons over 65, their wives and dependents, or to the wives and children of insured persons who died. Forty-seven million dollars additional was expended to administer this program, and $190,000,000 was charged against the general revenues for interest on the public debt held in the old-age and survivors insurance trust account.

In sum, almost $3,000,000,000 were disbursed in the form of benefits under the three major social-security programs in the year ended June 30, 1948, and more than $150,000,000 were expended in administering them. In addition, the sum of $337,000,000 was charged against the general revenues for interest on obligations held in social-security trust accounts. The aggregate expenditures were distributed about half and half between the Federal and State Governments.

Allowing for the fact that the same person in some situations may have been a recipient under more than one program, and for other duplications, between eight and nine million persons were the direct beneficiaries of these expenditures.

The present fiscal year will bring an increase of expenditures. This can be predicted with certainty even under the favorable conditions of more people at work, greater production, a mounting gross national product. Contributions by the Federal Government out of the general revenues for the relief of need in the current year will be at least $200,000,000 more than last year—seven-eighths of this increase by reason of congressional action this year in enlarging the participation of the Federal Government in public-assistance programs.

One hundred million dollars more in benefits under the Federal old-age and survivors insurance program will be disbursed in the present fiscal year, and the charges for interest on the public debt held by the Old-Age and Survivors Insurance and Unemployment Insurance Trust Accounts will be greater by reason of the increased size of the reserves.

Expenditures under the three major social-security programs in the present fiscal year will be nearer to $4,000,000,000 than to three billion. This is the picture as matters stand at present.

However, when the existing old-age and survivors insurance program will have come into full effect—assuming no addition to present commitments of the existing program—disbursement of old-age and survivors insurance benefits, instead of a half billion dollars as in fiscal 1948, could be as much as $8,500,000,000 by actuarial estimate.

This estimate assumes continuation of the employment and wage levels of 1944–46 which, while below present levels, still represent a high level of economic activity. The estimate is based on the assumption of a static wage level. If there should be a continuance of the historical upward trend in wages, with a decreasing mortality rate and an increasing proportion of the population over 65 years of age, expenditures under the existing program without change would be considerably greater than the eight-and-a-half-billion estimate.

Under an expanded program for old-age and survivors insurance, recommended by the Advisory Council under amendments much more conservative than others which have been proposed in the Congress, and following the same assumptions as were employed in arriving at the eight-and-a-half-billion estimate, the disbursements could be as much as $15,000,000,000. Two billion dollars more would be added to this figure by conservative estimate of the additional costs of administration and interest on the public debt credited to the trust account.

The decision as to distribution of these costs as between the worker, the employer, and possibly the general taxpayer will, as has been said, touch profound political, economic, and social questions.

There will be small measure of economic security in a social-security program constructed in ignorance of its total implications, or in disregard of what its promises involve for the future, or in concealment of its burdens as means of escape from the difficulties of sound planning, or proceeding upon lightly accepted assumptions.

The people are entitled to know these facts which show that the Congress is alert to the need for improvement in our social-security system, is alert to the human problems involved, and is moving forward rapidly in finding sound solutions.

The people are also entitled to be informed with facts why the Congress refused to embark upon an hysterial degradation of responsible legislative processes to please an ill-considered Presidential whim. We believe the showing made is sufficient.

Dewey and Warren Dedicate Their Efforts to a Better America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 28, 1948

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, I have asked unanimous consent of the House to include with my own brief remarks the addresses of Gov. Thomas E. Dewey, of New York, and Gov. Earl Warren, of California, in accepting their nominations for President and Vice President of the United States at the National Republican Convention in Philadelphia, Pa., June 24 and 25, 1948.

I have asked this, not in the partisan sense, but for the benefit of readers of the RECORD and the American public as well.

From both of these pronouncements, echoed and reechoed around the world, there arises a new hope, a new spiritual awakening, and a new landmark in our history in the reaffirmation of historic truths. By these truths a people and peoples may work in brotherhood and peace, and hence bolster our cornerstone of freedom. Here is the only path of true progress.

We who labor in the fruitful fields of the American heart land—the Midwest—and, indeed, all of us who are conscious of the Great Provider were particularly thankful for the simple humility and deep spirituality that this great call made manifest in these two men as they were anointed for national leadership.

By this we know their greatness and can understand the warmth of feeling of the people of New York and California toward the sons who have served them with such devotion and success. Though they come from the poles of our national continent, they speak a language as one with themselves and American people everywhere. They have encompassed our national thought.

Citizens everywhere will want to read the acceptance statements of these two outstanding American leaders.

It was my intention to insert the acceptance speeches of Governor Dewey and Governor Warren at this point in my remarks. However, because of a mix-up in picking up the copy for speeches on the House side, the request made by Senator ROBERT A. TAFT was received by the Government Printing Office and inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD first. Therefore, I now refer readers of the RECORD to the issue of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for Wednesday, July 28, for the full text of the acceptance speeches of Governor Dewey and Governor Warren at the Philadelphia Republican National Convention.

The Dewey speech will be found on page A4657 of the Appendix of the RECORD, and the Warren speech will be found on page A4658.

Special and Final Session, Eightieth Congress: Record and Forecasts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JACOB K. JAVITS
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

CALL FOR THE SPECIAL SESSION

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, the President announced at the Philadelphia convention of the Democratic Party that he was calling the Congress into special session primarily to deal with high prices and the housing shortage; and added also a list of other matters such as the United Nations loan agreement and the displaced persons bill. It is true that calling the Congress together in this political way had a tendency to prejudice the atmosphere at once and was, therefore, not too advisable, if the President really wanted results. Nevertheless, I, as one Congressman, was entirely satisfied that the Congress should be asked to do something tangible about these problems.

For one, I was the sponsor of the Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill for a comprehensive national housing program insofar as the House of Representatives was concerned, and welcomed the opportunity to wage a further fight for this legislation. Also I wanted an opportunity to amend the discriminatory DP bill which had passed in June 1948. Finally, I had fought for the $65,000,000 loan to enable the United Nations to establish its headquarters in New York, which had failed to get action in the regular session and I wanted it to pass.

But beyond anything else, it was clear that the economic security of the people of the United States had to be protected. For the prime consideration in the mind and heart of every citizen was a desire for peace and economic security. If prices continued to run away in the United States, the ability of the people to buy must at some point end, and the resulting depression would shake our society to its foundation. Also, if we had a depression here our resulting inability to help other democratic nations to effect recovery would result in sweeping changes in their own governments which could lead to war.

When the official session opened it was also clear that there were no easy solutions to our problems. The President recommended rationing and price control over key items in the cost of living, and in industrial production. I showed my views by introducing again the bill which I had sponsored with Senator FLANDERS as far back as January 1948, when I saw runaway prices getting worse, for the rationing and allocation of meat with added powers. I stated, in connection with this bill, that I favored also controls over dairy products and clothing, and over raw materials like steel, which affect the cost of living through the products which go into most manufactured goods. But none of us could forget at the same time the rampant black markets and the flight of goods from the stores, which had induced the same President to lift all controls in June of 1946, because they could not be effectively administered in peacetime. Our citizens will long remember the artificial meat famine of that time when meat just left the stores and was unobtainable at OPA prices, but could only be found in the black markets. I believe that it would be proper tc reimpose rationing and price controls as a temporary expedient on selected items like dairy products, meat, certain items of clothing, and steel. I would certainly expect also that we could see our way through to a permanent solution. The President, though, did not seem to be thinking beyond the coming election, for he gave no hope of anything but a continuing emergency which would require controls, as far as he indicated, forever, or until we got into a depression.

RATIONING AND CONTROL FAVORED NOW

My concern with the current price situation has been to endeavor to retain for wage and salary earners, the progress which was made during the war in attaining a higher standard of living. Because real wages—that is, wages expressed in terms of what the dollar will buy for one's family—increased by about 50 percent in 1946 over what they were in 1939 and even with the higher cost of living, there was still an absolute gain of about 25 percent. In other words, people were living one-fourth better than they had before the war. The key effort in prices, therefore, had to be to retain this advance in the standard of living for people with modest incomes and to make it permanent.

The political atmosphere of the special session has been so great that no rationing, allocation, or price-control powers have been given to the President, and the only controls passed have been credit controls. The President asked for these, also, and they are useful, but their effect is not immediate. The failure to pass legislation for direct controls was also contributed to by a lack of confidence in the analysis of the situation and of suitable remedies for it by the President and the administration, and in the ability of the President and his administration to wisely administer such controls. This very Congress had twice passed rent control and may have been gotten to pass rationing and price control if we had an effective administration.

Regardless of my own view that controls should be enacted into law at the special session, this has not been done. Congress will be back in session next January and action at that time on the price front must be sure and direct. There will no longer be any reason to delay due to lack of confidence in the administration, as the people will have given a new mandate. It must be coupled, however, with action affecting not only prices but other Government as well as economic activities which keep prices high.

So for example, Congress must review and overhaul the law providing support prices for agricultural products on which we are spending close to a billion dollars a year. We are supporting these prices at a time when the income of farmers is the highest in history.

Great statesmanship on the part of the new President and the new administration will also be required to get management and labor together to stop the wage-price spiral which causes wages and prices to be running a continuous race and for every round of wage increases, brings on an even greater price increase, leaving little benefit to those who work.

Finally, we must establish some means by which we shall plan ahead with respect to production and other essential aspects of our economic life—as is done in any well-run business—and not rely on the cycle of prosperity and depression to work out our problems. I have said before that the people just will not take the punishment involved in that planlessness with its deepening depressions. I have introduced a bill for the establishment of a National Economic Commission which proposes a way in which this result can be effected while retaining fully our Democratic processes.

HOUSING—T-E-W BILL

The President also called us back into session to deal with housing and as I have stated, as the sponsor in the House of the Taft-Ellender-Wagner comprehensive housing bill, I welcomed this opportunity to fight for its enactment. Together with other liberal Congressmen similarly interested, I realized that only by getting the legislation on the floor of the House of Representatives for a vote could we be successful. For this legislation had been killed before through the action or inaction of committees. Accordingly, I joined with these colleagues in the fight to get a majority of the Members of the House of Representatives to sign a discharge petition which would have brought the T-E-W bill out for a vote. We fought hard and came within a very close margin of success, but did not quite make it. The housing bill finally passed by the House of Representatives at this special session is largely a bill to aid private construction of low-cost homes. The bill also picks up one important part of the T-E-W bill and makes it law—that providing for Government insurance of investments in medium rental housing—which should be a powerful stimulus to this type of construction in large cities like New York by insurance companies and banks. Though I had worked on this yield insurance program for almost 2 years and was deeply gratified to see it enacted, I could not vote for the housing bill but voted "present," because it omitted federally subsidized low-rent housing and slum clearance. In this way the bill discriminated against not less than 36 percent of the American people who live in families with incomes of $2,000 per year or less.

On August 5, 1948, I made a speech in the House of Representatives answering the arguments made against the T-E-W bill. It is interesting to consider these arguments in view of the limited housing bill which was passed. As I stated during the debate, the fight for federally subsidized low-rent housing, slum clearance, and federally aided farm housing will go on and will be successful in the next Congress. I repeat here from my address referred to above, some of the answers to the objections made to these features of the T-E-W bill.

The T-E-W bill is also criticized because it will put the Government in the housing business to compete for scarce men and materials. But it will do nothing of the kind. It provides for only a maximum of 100,000 units of public housing per annum; this is 10 percent of present housing construction and would be 7½ percent of the construction expected under the T-E-W bill. That is the least which can be done to bring a share of the new housing within reach of those in the lower-income brackets who need it most. T-E-W will reduce costs and accelerate private construction; it will not compete with it.

Second. Private industry is doing the job. Even if this were true, it is a fact that the housing produced is not within the price range, either for sale or rental, of those in the middle- and lower-income levels who need it most. The average price of a home around New York City is $13,000, veterans generally cannot pay more than $6,000. Housing starts in June 1948 decreased about 4 percent from those in May 1948. Not less than 30 percent of the housing construction in the country was done prior to March 31, 1948, under mortgage-insurance provided by title VI of the National Housing Act. It is freely predicted even by real-estate interests that 100,000 additional home units will be lost this year because title VI went out March 31, 1948, and it is estimated that total housing completions this year will not be much more than 900,000 units. In the face of an immediate demand from two to four million veterans living doubled up with relatives, an answer from the housing-construction industry is hardly, "business as usual."

Third. It is said that the T-E-W bill would be inflationary in its effect. This must be premised on the absolute expenditure involved. Commitments under the T-E-W bill are a maximum of $160,000,000 of subsidies per year with a total of $1,610,000,000 to $2,610,000,000 of insurance authorization, and $1,310,000,000 to $1,560,000,000 of revolving loan funds generally considered collectible; there is general agreement on the United States being committed for the insurance authorizations whether or not T-E-W passes. That leaves a maximum of $160,000,000 yearly in subsidies. There is no such outcry, however, as meets this expenditure for housing lower-income families, when it comes to aiding certain special interests. It is, therefore, interesting to compare the expressed fears of inflation due to a housing bill with the following appropriations made by the Eightieth Congress:

Rural electrification	$636,000,000
Soil conservation	203,000,000
AAA farm-support program	265,500,000
Reclamation projects	156,000,000
Flood control, rivers and harbors	900,000,000
Federal aid to highway construction	1,147,000,000
Foreign aid and the ERP	7,000,000,000
Total	9,301,500,000

DP'S AND THE UNITED NATIONS

Two other subjects to which I have devoted myself in the special session have been the correction of the injustice done by the displaced persons bill passed in June 1948, and the consummation of the loan to enable the United Nations to build its home in New York City.

It will be recalled that the displaced persons bill through utilizing an eligibility date of December 1945, as against an eligibility date of April 1947, resulted in direct discrimination against Jews who had escaped from political and religious persecution in eastern Europe immediately following and as a result of the war, and Catholics who had similarly escaped from such persecution from eastern and southeastern Europe. For these tens of thousands of unfortunates had entered the DP camps after December 1945 but before April 1947. I set myself a limited objective during the special session to get this date changed. This alone would have meant the difference between hope and hopelessness for well over 50,000 DP's out of the 203,000 to be admitted from the DP camps in 2 years under the law. Though I fought hard, made a number of speeches on this point in the House of Representatives, fought the issue as well among my colleagues, getting, I am happy to state, the support of the Speaker of the House of Representatives and many Members, it was just impossible to get this amendment to the DP bill passed in this short special session. The Senate had inserted the December, 1945, date and the House had used the correct April, 1947, date, and it was impossible to get Senate action despite the best efforts of Senators SMITH of New Jersey, IVES, FERGUSON, COOPER, and others of both parties. The injustice is so apparent, however, that I have great confidence that we shall get such an amendment passed early in the next session, and I intend to make this one of my principal efforts at that time if I am returned to Congress.

UNITED NATIONS LOAN

The United Nations headquarters loan of $65,000,000 was a business transaction on good security to enable the United Nations to build its headquarters on the East River in the Borough of Manhattan from Forty-second to Forty-eighth Street. I had introduced the original legislation at the request of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The city and State of New York were cooperating to the extent of $20,000,000 in expenditures, and the site, worth $8,500,000, had been donated. Here, too, I fought the battle through the conferences with my colleagues, through the Foreign Affairs Committee, of which I am a member, and through the House of Representatives itself. I said in the debate that if we do not make this loan we will have in New York City "a black hole of Calcutta," the excavation for the United Nations headquarters, but without the headquarters itself. The House of Representatives passed the bill and the United Nations can now go forward with construction. Not only will this construction beautify a part of Manhattan Island with great structures but it will center the United Nations, which is the world's best hope for peace, permanently in the United States, where I believe it has the greatest chance to succeed in its mission of abolishing war as a means for settling international disputes and substituting for it, law.

OTHER DOMESTIC LEGISLATION

Other desirable legislation was called to the attention of the Congress at the special session which I favor very much. I wanted to bring up this legislation and pass it. I am disappointed that these measures were not acted on. The fight must go on and must be won. Primary among these measures is the fight for civil rights, the antilynching, anti-poll-tax, and FEPC bills. The House of Representatives passed the antilynching bill over a year ago and I voted for it. I am also a cosponsor of the FEPC bill in the House. The fight for these measures, essential to vindicate justice and the Constitution, must continue to success in the next Congress.

Federal aid to education also failed of enactment in this Congress. Such aid must not be delayed. The problems of our day are too great and too complex to neglect the education of our youth in all the States, whether rich or poor, North or South. For the educational level of all Americans will determine the fate of our country for each American.

A reform of the social-security system, particularly for old age and survivors insurance is essential. The amount of insurance reserves already created indicates that benefits can and should be increased by 50 percent, and allowable earnings of beneficiaries from sources other than the social security system should be materially raised. The country can afford to be fair to its faithful, aged citizens.

The minimum wage at 40 cents an hour must be raised to not less than 75 cents an hour. In terms of the present cost of living, the 40-cent rate is completely unrealistic anywhere in the United States.

Rent control, a critical item in the whole plan of family life, must be continued by extending the Federal law after March 31, 1949, and it must be strengthened to prevent improper rent increases. The hundreds of cases in my own district in which my own office has had to prevent tenants from being victimized by some landlords or through improper administration of the rent-control law, shows the need for a stronger law to protect tenants. I have fought before and will fight again to strengthen the law in this way.

CONCLUSION

The country is at peace and is enjoying a high level of real prosperity, but there are very serious problems which make us all feel that both the peace and the prosperity are in grave peril. Hence, we are proposing to take measures to deal with these problems. These measures will largely be taken in the next two years. They will require vigorous independence, initiative, ideas, and character in our President and legislators, and a profound understanding of our Government and our Constitution. They will also require outstanding qualities of discipline, understanding, and patriotism among our citizens. It is the possession of these qualities which has made and will keep us great. The American people will be considering these problems with their heads and their hearts, fully cognizant of what is at stake, and with complete independence untrammeled by party allegiance or traditional connections with any group or any party, but with an eye single to the well being of our Nation. It is for this reason that I have complete faith in the outcome. America will be greater tomorrow than it is today.

Protection for the Glassworkers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD G. ROHRBOUGH
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. ROHRBOUGH. Mr. Speaker, the Eightieth Congress has done something to protect the glassworkers of West Virginia as well as the glassworkers of other States and as a result they no longer are defenseless victims of high-handed State Department policy.

I refer, Mr. Speaker, to the action which the Congress has taken in modifying the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act. The administration, I regret to say, does not share my enthusiasm for the modifications. Neither is it satisfied with the extension for only 1 year. The administration wanted the act extended for another 3 years, just as it was. It repeated its request for a 3-year extension which it made in 1946 and which my predecessor in office voted for.

I did not approve the proposed 3-year extension and I am thankful that neither did the majority of the Members of Congress. This Congress had no intention of being a party to a plan which threatened to reduce the standard of living of American glassworkers to that of nationalized Soviet workers.

Do you remember what happened with respect to tariffs on glassware just a few weeks after Czechoslovakia fell under the "iron curtain"? Our State Department granted to this Russian satellite tariff reductions on glassware ranging from 30 to 45 percent. I did not approve.

I think it is significant that more than 50 percent of the cost of glassware represents wages. Our State Department apparently believes that if Czechoslovakia can supply the United States with hand-made glassware cheaper than we can produce it, our glassworkers should find new jobs while the Czechs take over the manufacture of glass. I do not agree with this policy.

While I am not opposed to the general principle of reciprocal trade agreements, I do not believe that we should let this principle become a death warrant for a great American industry. Trade is an exchange and reciprocal should imply that the exchange be on an equitable basis. The barriers which the State Department has lowered have been ours. Those which have been strengthened have been those of other nations. I do not agree with this policy.

Mr. A. U. Debrucque, president of the Window Glass Cutters' League of America, told me in a letter which I received just before the vote upon the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Extension Act that he expected Congress to help to undo the harm which the State Department had committed.

We didn't elect the State Department—

He said—

we elected you.

Mr. Speaker, Congress has undertaken to undo the harm. Although those who espouse the policies of the incumbent administration may not approve, it is my opinion that an overwhelming majority of the citizens of this Nation agree with the Congress.

Efforts in Behalf of Constituents

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DAVID M. POTTS
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. POTTS. Mr. Speaker, on several occasions during the last two legislative years I kept my constituents informed of matters pending or in the offing and my position with respect to them. I have asked them to write me their views.

They are entitled now to a report about my efforts in their behalf.

LABOR

I believe that laws governing labor and management relations should be the subject of constant study so that as the possibility of improvement becomes apparent from the experience of the past the law might be improved. It is not difficult to recall the utter chaos into which the Nation was pitched and the general public made to suffer in late 1945 and in 1946. The country was in a stagnant condition. No coal was available and industry after industry had to be shut down. Milk trucks bound for the city were overturned. Extortionate demands were being made by some unscrupulous labor leaders. Some of them were stealing funds from their unions for which they have gone to jail. The railroads were not running and President Truman had asked for legislation to draft strikers into the Army. A major depression was feared. It was apparent that this situation had to be corrected. Machinery had to be set up to settle disputes fairly between employees and employers and to protect the general public at the same time.

After extensive study, the Labor-Management Relations Act was passed by an overwhelming majority by Congress. As a matter of fact, it had the vote of a very substantial majority of the Democratic Party and consequently was a nonpartisan measure.

In its original form the measure did not wholly satisfy me and upon the floor of the House I stated wherein I thought it should be amended by the Senate.

Here are some of its more important clauses:

It forbids employers to check off union dues unless the worker has voluntarily authorized the employer to do so.

When employers and unions establish funds for the welfare of workers and their families, it requires them to do so under arrangements that will make certain that the money will be used for these purposes and not for other purposes of the union leaders.

It requires unions to tell their members how much money they take in, where they get it, what they spend it for and to disclose what they pay their officers; how much they charge for dues, the grounds on which they expel members and other matters that the members are entitled to know. It requires unions and employers, when labor contracts come to an end, to negotiate for 60 days before engaging in a strike or lock-out. It forbids unions, by jurisdictional strikes and boycotts, to try to get control over employees who have not chosen the union as their bargaining agent, or who have chosen another union as their bargaining agent. It preserves in the same language as appears in the Wagner Act, the rights of workers to organize and to bargain collectively, and just as the old act did, it forbids employers to interfere with the employees, or to threaten or coerce them when they exercise these rights.

It forbids corporations to use stockholders' money for political purposes and forbids unions to use members' money for political purposes.

It enables the President to delay for a time strikes that imperil the public health or safety, as he did in the great coal strike early this year. The law will not prevent all strikes, but it has proven to be fair and just, and with honest administration it will bring a greater measure of peace to the industrial scene than we have known for many years.

If defects appear in the law, I shall listen to labor's complaints and I shall support efforts to correct them.

VETERANS

Over 180 laws directly benefiting war veterans were passed by Congress. The Government will bear 50 percent of the cost of homes for veterans paralyzed from the waist down. These homes will be specially designed.

Special-type automobiles were provided for amputees. Cashing of terminal-leave bonds was provided for. Ceilings on wages and allowances payable to veterans in on-the-job training were raised. Another act increased compensation for dependent survivors of war dead. The revolving fund for loans to World War II veterans engaged in vocational training was increased. The Civil Service Code was amended to prevent discrimination against physically handicapped veterans in Government positions.

COMMUNISM

I have fought this menace and scourge all along. I introduced a resolution—House Concurrent Resolution 33—to have the case of Archbishop Stepinac referred to the United Nations. I voted to increase the appropriation for the House Committee on Un-American Activities, which has exposed Communists in and out of Government. I voted to cite many of these parasites for contempt of Congress in refusing to answer pertinent questions. Some of them have been tried before juries. All who have been have been convicted. I voted for legislation to seek out the many Communists which past experience and exposure prove are still infesting our Government.

HIGH COST OF LIVING

To a great extent the high cost of living was caused by the Government, under President Truman, going into the market and buying tremendous stocks of foodstuffs in order to bolster falling markets. Now if these purchases had not been made by the Government, prices would have fallen and the housewives would have received the benefit. What was even worse in my estimation was the fact that after the Government made these purchases, it allowed the foodstuffs to go to waste. We can all remember the mountains of potatoes which were allowed to rot after being harvested and after the Government bought them or which were willfully spoiled by the Government having kerosene poured over them. We can also remember the millions of dozens of eggs which the Government bought and took off the market and put in cold storage.

I have repeatedly spoken out against these tactics and I have opposed the extension of farm-support programs now that the war is over.

There is nothing wrong with the United States that production and sound fiscal policies will not correct. Of course, if those having the power and responsibility of government will not use the powers given to them for the purpose of stabilizing prices, then the result is runaway prices. The power to stabilize prices has been with the President and the Federal Reserve System for years. They have not been wisely used in the past. Proper use of them from now on can stop higher prices and will result in stability. Heretofore the policy of the Government was to make money and credit easier, to cheapen the dollar, and to raise prices and unfortunately it was altogether too successful for the good of our economy.

HOUSING

I have voted for all measures which have come to the floor of the House designed to increase the building of homes. These included additional incentives for the building of rental housing so badly needed in city areas; freeing the building industry of stifling rules, regulations, and directives; having a greater part of the responsibility for veterans' loans assumed by the Government and giving to war veterans priority in home building and rental of new homes.

In 1946 when all kinds of Government regulations were killing off all incentive to build, only 437,000 dwelling units were completed. In 1947, after the present Congress came into being and began correcting the situation, over 835,000 units were completed and in this year, on Government figures, it is estimated that 1,000,000 units will be completed. It will be the greatest building period in the history of our country.

NATIONAL DEFENSE

I have felt for a long time that the umbrella appeasement policies of Munich did not bring peace and that the greatest assurance that peace would be maintained under present conditions was to be had only if we provided a well-trained and fully equipped Army, Navy, and Air Force adequate to meet any emergency under future conditions of warfare. Consequently I voted for unification of the armed services. I also voted for a 70-group air force and for full appropriations for the armed services.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

I have striven for an enduring world peace. I have supported the United Nations organization in that hope. I have voted for foreign aid in such amounts as could be justified for the purposes intended.

I voted for the International Refugee Organization. But unhappily Congress has not been taken into the confidence of the President and consequently there is no knowledge of the extent of further secret commitments made at Yalta, Tehran, Potsdam, and elsewhere which have aided so materially in today's world confusion.

NATIONAL DEBT

Notwithstanding tax reductions voted by the Congress and which I supported we were able to balance the budget and cut the national debt by $7,000,000,000.

FORT SCHUYLER

I fought for and obtained a full appropriation for the New York State Maritime Training Academy at Fort Schuyler, Throggs Neck, and for the United States Merchant Marine Academy at Kings Point, Long Island, and Pass Christian, Miss., after the President through his Bureau of the Budget had slashed the appropriation for this vital arm of our industry in peace and defense in war.

OLEOMARGARINE

For a long time an unwarranted tax has been placed on this nutritious food solely to subsidize the dairy farmers. I led the fight to repeal the tax and made the first speech thereon on the floor of the House in debate.

SOCIAL SECURITY

This subject in its entirety is being explored by the House Committee on Ways and Means. In the meantime certain improvements designed to extend the coverage and benefits of the system were made law in this Congress.

MISCELLANEOUS

I aided substantially in obtaining pay raises for low-paid postal workers and other Federal employees. I obtained time and spoke over the radio on their behalf.

I introduced House Joint Resolution 366 to establish an Interfaith Day.

Gift parcels sent abroad required oftentimes the payment of more postage than the cost of the food sent. I was instrumental in having this postage reduced.

I have fought the shipment of our own vitally needed oil to Russia.

St. Ann's of Morrisania is a shrine because there in its graveyard are buried many famous men, such as Gouveneur Morris, a signer of the Declaration of Independence. Although unsuccessful to date in having it declared to be a national shrine, I have been working with Dr. Russell to have it made so.

I have helped to have disability pensions of policemen and firemen declared exempt from income tax. I worked to have included in the tax-reduction bill an additional personal exemption for people over 65 years of age. Now, a married couple of that age have a combined personal exemption of $2,400, so that most elderly pensioners will now be relieved from paying any Federal income tax.

A Report to Vermonters

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES A. PLUMLEY OF VERMONT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to make the following report to the people of Vermont:

In the preface of a little book about Calvin Coolidge, my friend Bruce Barton tells that, when on a visit to Cal, the latter "pulled out of his desk an old yellow pamphlet. It was the record of a law passed by the selectmen of Belchertown, Mass., after the Revolutionary War, fixing the prices which the farmers would be allowed to charge for their produce in the Belchertown market. Mr. Coolidge said, 'Isn't it strange how, in every period of economic disturbance, people have the idea that you can pass a law and fix everything?' "

Well, fellow Vermonters, there are those who still appear to think that all the problems involved in the cost-of-living, security for the individual from the cradle to the grave, education, morals, peace—all these and more—can be taken care of "by just passing a law."

It could not be done in the days of the Roman Empire; it could not be done in the days of Cal Coolidge; it cannot be done today. And you and I know it.

There are laws that have to be enacted. We are still a young nation, and still growing. New problems arise daily. Under changing conditions there is need for a revision of existing law and the enactment of new laws—but mere lawmaking never did, and does not now, mean that all problems can be settled by legislation.

I should like to report to you, however, concerning some of the laws enacted during the last Congress that have a bearing on your daily lives; and I should like to speak of my activities in connection with their enactment. I would prefer to sit down in your kitchen or living room and visit with you about this job of representing the people of Vermont in Washington; but that is not possible; so I take this means of coming into your home and making my report.

Before doing that, however, let me say that the many years of apprenticeship served by me in Vermont serving Vermonters—as assistant clerk, clerk, and then speaker of the Vermont Legislature, then as commissioner of taxes, then as president of Norwich University—were of tremendous benefit to me when I came to Congress, and have served me in good stead throughout my congressional service.

My service in Washington during the history-making years since 1934 have provided a background hard to equal. I have been given every reason to assume I have earned a respected place among my colleagues—a place that can enhance the service I may render the people of Vermont during the 2 years to come; a 2-year period that will see, for the first time in 16 years, a Republican administration in power.

I serve on the House Committee on Appropriations, than which there is no more important and powerful committee in the Congress. I am the third ranking member of the committee, serving as chairman of the Navy Appropriations Committee, and as ranking Republican member of the Agriculture Appropriations Committee.

Thus, every single dollar of Federal funds appropriated for agriculture in the country—and in Vermont, of course—must be cleared by my committee.

I realize quite humbly that it is not my money that is being appropriated by my committee—it is your money. And we of the Appropriations Committee have tried to see that your money was wisely and prudently spent.

SOIL CONSERVATION

There has been some talk in Vermont about soil conservation. Well, there would not have been as substantial funds made available for this worth-while work if it had not been for a few of us on the Agriculture Appropriations Committee who insisted in committee, on the floor of the House, and in conference committee that adequate funds should be and must be provided.

The result of my activity, and that of like-minded colleagues meant that approximately $1,000,000, or double the amount available last year, has been presently made available for soil conservation in Vermont. The record is clear, there is no room for doubt on this matter.

RURAL ELECTRIFICATION

The last Congress provided twice as much money for rural electrification as any previous Congress. In fact, the amount appropriated was only $275,000,000 less than the total amount provided by all the previous Congresses lumped together.

And, here again, Vermonters participating in the rural electrification program and those who are members of electric cooperatives are the beneficiaries. I am glad to have played an active part in this matter affecting the agricultural portion of Vermont, as a member of the committee on agricultural appropriations.

EXTENSION SERVICE, 4–H, AND THE LIKE

Similarly all of the various parts of the whole agricultural picture that participate in Vermont through the availability of Federal funds, such as the Extension Service, the 4–H Clubs, the University of Vermont, and the like, have had my active and interested support.

This last Congress, furthermore, adopted a long-range agricultural program pledging price support for maximum production of food; it launched the greatest rural road-building program in history; it enacted a new, workable Crop Insurance Act, chartered the Commodity Credit Corporation, and greatly enlarged the Government-aid programs against cattle diseases, crop deterrents, and pests. I was proud to have taken an active part in these pieces of progressive legislation.

TAXES

I voted for tax relief during the past Congress. That has meant considerable to many, many Vermonters. Despite three vetoes by President Truman, all of which I voted to override, the last Congress reduced taxes by over $4,800,000,000—with 71 percent of that tax relief going to those with incomes under $5,000. There were 7,400,000 wage earners in the lowest income brackets removed from the Federal tax rolls; married couples were allowed to divide their income for tax purposes, and special tax relief was granted to persons over 65 and to the blind.

NATIONAL DEFENSE

I have been for adequate national defense during my entire congressional career. I was for building up our defenses long before the last war and when the isolationists were in full cry. I still believe in preparedness and the necessity for adequate defense.

As a member of the Committee on Appropriations for the Navy it became my responsibility to pilot through the House an appropriation bill involving over $3,000,000,000—all devoted to the defense of our country in that important arm of defense.

In addition, I supported legislation providing for a greatly enlarged Air Corps, and for bringing unity to our armed services through unification legislation.

My whole national defense record shows the emphasis I have placed on adequacy of our armed forces in times both of peace and war. The record discloses the fact that there are few, if any, members of the Republican Party in the Congress who have any better record on national defense legislation than do I.

VETERANS

The last Congress passed some 188 bills meeting the needs of war veterans, including compensation for disabled veterans with and without dependents; increased compensation for dependent survivors of war dead; increased subsistence payments to World War II veterans in institutional training; increased allowances for student GI's; increased proportional pay for veterans in on-the-job training; cashing of GI terminal leave bonds; higher pensions for Spanish-American War veterans, and aids for veterans' housing.

EDUCATION

I favor Federal aid for education, but only when such aid so granted is administered by the States; thus, guaranteeing that the educational program of the State is controlled by the State rather than the Federal Government.

LABOR

My vote was cast for the Taft-Hartley Labor-Management Act in the belief it provided fair and just procedures for peaceful settlement of labor-management disputes. It seemed to me that it protected the rights of workers to unionize and control their own unions, to bargain collectively, and to strike; that it restored the constitutional rights of employers, and safeguarded all the people against widespread work stoppages and production stoppages that might imperil the national welfare. If it needs to be amended, it will be amended; time will demonstrate the fact.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

My active support of the European recovery program in Congress is well known, as is the fact that I actively cooperated to make effective the bipartisan foreign policy of this Government.

OTHER MATTERS

The foregoing seem to me to be the high-lighted portions of activity during the last Congress. There are many important matters that occurred that have not been mentioned, including the highly significant drive that has been made on communism in this country and in our own Government, a drive that has my wholehearted support. I have not mentioned the balancing of the budget by a Republican Congress, the first balanced budget in 16 years; nor have I mentioned the legislation providing for admission of over 200,000 displaced persons, nor the extension of the Reciprocal Trade Act, nor the aid extended to small business, nor the cost-of-living increases provided for postal and other Federal employees, wherein 478,000 postal workers received pay increases of $450 each, and 840,000 civil-service workers received a boost of $330 each, nor many another piece of worth-while legislation for which I voted and which had my support, but time and space prevent mentioning more.

I have considered it a great honor to represent the people of Vermont in the Congress of the United States. I have endeavored to protect and to promote their welfare and their interest at every opportunity, and shall so continue to act and vote as your Representative in the Congress of the United States.

Repeal of Excess-Profits Tax

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EUGENE D. MILLIKIN

OF COLORADO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement on repeal of excess-profits tax.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In the course of the President's message to this special session a program was proposed for the asserted purpose of controlling inflation.

The No. 1 recommendation was for the reestablishment of an excess-profits tax and this will be the main subject of these remarks.

However, this particular proposal was tied in with other recommendations for the reimposition of allocations, rationing, price and inventory controls.

This parcel of egregious error was misdirected to a peacetime America devoted to its economic and political freedoms and was rejected by the people's representatives in Congress.

We learned about those remedies by our experience with them. The people tossed them into the ashcan in 1946. We have continued to learn about them through the burdens assumed by us in sustaining foreign nations which have been reduced to mendicancy by continuing to adhere to them.

Even those who can conceive of peacetime emergencies equal in seriousness to those of war, and which in their opinion might warrant such drastic measures on a temporary basis and so limited and operated, would not dream of granting the administrative responsibility to those who so atrociously bungled similar powers when they had them a few years ago, and even more important than this, who basically believe in permanent, planned Federal regimentation.

The common fallacy in peacetimes of excess-profits taxes, price and inventory controls, allocations and rationing, as remedies for high prices, is, as we have learned from our own and the experience of many other nations, that they impede production, thus continuing or aggravating the scarcities which, because they are scarce, overweigh the seller's command of price, and may stimulate his avarice.

Such controls frustrate the achievement of the larger supply of goods necessary to balance the unsatisfied demands of the available supply of money. More and more production until the buyer and seller are equipped with approximately equal bargaining power is, therefore, the desirable goal. This reduces the seller's dictation of the market and thus reduces prices and establishes the real value of both the goods and the money.

Any proposed measure, therefore, that interferes with the corrective processes of increased production is bad. Since the obvious purpose of an excess-profits tax is to limit profits, our burden is to show that this would limit production. What then is the relation of profits to production? Where do we get the capital for the necessary increase in production?

We have not yet embraced state socialism, although when the trend was interrupted in 1946 we were panting on its shoulder. So the Government as a broad and certain source for productive capital is out.

We, therefore, must look to the outside private investor or to internal financing by business itself. And contrary to much opinion, the main load, as we shall see, must be carried by business out of its own resources without outside aid.

Since industry cannot supply productive capital by cannibalizing itself, it must use its profits.

The crucial role of business in supplying its own capital needs out of its own profits was well developed by Dr. Sumner H. Slichter, Lamont University professor at Harvard, and chairman of the research advisory board of the Committee for Economic Development, in an article published in the Atlantic Monthly of July 1948. He said:

"Were profits in 1947 effective in attracting additional capital into industry—particularly purchases of equity securities by the public? The answer to this question is emphatically "No." Last year American corporations spent $26,700,000,000 on plant and equipment, inventories, and extending credit to customers. Only $4,100,000,000 of this money came from the sale of securities to the general public. Of this amount, over two-thirds came from the bond issues, and less than one-third from the sale of stock. In other words, less than 5 percent of the capital funds of American corporations last year came from the sale of stock. About 60 percent came from inside the enterprises themselves—from depreciation allowances, the sale of Government securities, and most of all, from the reinvestment of profits.

"There has been some criticism of the large reinvestment of profits in industry. As a matter of fact, the country should be thankful that over four-fifths of the increase in profits between 1946 and 1947 was plowed back into industry rather than distributed in the form of dividends. This meant that industry, instead of holding back production as it is sometimes accused of doing, was spending large amounts to increase output. To a limited extent and for a short period of time, plowing back profits may divert the output of industry from making consumer goods to making capital goods. This, of course, is inflationary. As new plant and equipment is put into operation, however, the output of goods relative to incomes is increased."

Department of Commerce statistics and those of the President's Council of Economic Advisers on net new issues of corporate securities for the first half of 1948 contrasted with the second half of 1947 show that there is no improvement in the ability of outside private investment to assume the load of productive capital formation now being supplied directly by industries out of their own profits. They show also that the trend of investment from outside sources continues in the direction of low risk rather than in full risk-taking securities.

	First half 1948 [1]	Second half 1947 [2]
	Billions of dollars	Billions of dollars
Bonds	2.1	2.0
Stocks	.5	.7
Total	2.6	2.7
	Percent of total	Percent of total
Bonds	80.9	74.1

[1] First half of 1948 figures were derived from table 30 of the Midyear Economic Report of the President, July 1948.

[2] Second half figures were obtained from the Department of Commerce, Office of Business Economics, Business Structure Division.

A number of reasons may be assigned for the shortage of outside investment capital. These include excessive taxes, fears aroused by hate-your-employer campaigns, and by the recurrence of proposals from official sources for regressive measures, such as the excess-profits tax.

But these causes cannot be eliminated with sufficient speed or certainty to meet the present requirement for quick and adequate supply of capital for increasing production.

It boils down to this: If we want increased production, we cannot have decreased profits, and therefore we cannot have an excess-profits tax.

These simple controlling facts are often blinked by proponents of an excess-profits tax. They claim that the profits of business are exorbitant and that this in and of itself is an evil of such magnitude that regardless of consequences in other directions, they should be frozen or reduced.

They meet the whole problem by pointing to isolated horror exhibits showing abnormally large profits. They agonize over large profit figures but do not relate them to volume of business, taxes, wages, replacement factors, nor to historical perspective materials.

They want to do something about it, but they have never succeeded in evolving a formula which will distinguish fairly between large profits which must be earned to compensate large risks and those profits which assume hoggish magnitude. Their strictures under rigid and mechanical formulas would operate on all alike regardless of culpability or differing circumstances.

Their dialectics, which are amazingly similar to those of the state socialists, do not face up to the incentive depressant nature of their remedy.

They are indifferent to the fact that competition where it exists has a way of taking morbid swelling out of profits, that where competition does not exist, antitrust and monopoly statutes provide available weapons, and that the jailhouse is an excellent antidote for greedy monopolists.

Where competition does not have full play in short-supply markets not caused by monopolistic practices, they discount or ignore the influence of more production as a solution for the problem. Basically, they are more interested in sharing shortages than in sharing abundance.

Now, let us take a factual look at their blanket and indiscriminate claims of excessive profits.

Dr. Slichter, in the same article, said:

"Profits in 1947 were slightly more than twice as large as in 1929 and about two and three-fourths times as high as in 1940. Large as were profits in 1947, they were not large in relation to the size of the product of industry. In fact, profits in 1947 were a smaller part of the gross national product than in 1929 and 1940—7.4 percent, compared with 8.1 percent in 1929 and 7.6 percent in 1940. Americans must remember that the country is growing and that prewar magnitudes often have little relevance in measuring the present performance of industry. Today the United States has 22,000,000 more people than in 1929 and 12,000,000 more than in 1940; in other words, it has added the equivalent of about two Canadas to its population since 1929 and one Canada since 1940.

"Profits per dollar of sales in 1947 were slightly less than in 1929 and slightly more than in 1940—5.8 cents in 1947, in comparison with 6.1 cents in 1929 and 4.8 cents in 1940. This means that the large profits of 1947 were in the main the result of a large volume of sales rather than of a wider spread between selling prices and costs. Incidentally, all forms of income from property—profits, interest, and rents—were only one-sixth of the national income in 1947, in comparison with over one-fourth in 1880 and about one-fifth in 1929.

"What yardstick should one use in judging whether profits are too large or too small? Profits have the function of providing industry with capital—partly by giving people an incentive to invest their savings in industry and partly by directly providing industry with investment funds. Hence one's judgment concerning the adequacy of profits depends upon how fast one wishes industry to grow.

"At present American industry is in urgent need of huge amounts of additional capital. There are two principal reasons for this need. One is that the increase in capital since 1929 has been abnormally slow. During 3 years of the severe depression of the thirties and 4 years of the war, plant and equipment for civilian industries was not being produced as rapidly as it was wearing out or becoming obsolete, and in three other years the net increase in capital was negligible. In the 50 years preceding 1929 the country annually produced about $1.75 of capital for every dollar of plant and equipment which wore out or became obsolete, so that the plant and equipment of the country was growing rapidly. In the last 19 years, however, the country has produced only about $1.14 of new capital per year for every dollar of plant and equipment which wore out, with the result that at the end of 1947 the industrial plant of the country represented less than 8 percent more capital than at the beginning of 1929.

"Again, industry needs large amounts of capital because of the great increase in the labor force. The labor force in private industry today is ten and one-tenth millions larger than in 1929, and about four and five-tenths millions larger than in 1940—partly a result of the growth in population but also a result of the growing popularity of work and of the increasing proportion of the population who seek work. With the abnormally small increase in capital during the last 19 years and a rapid increase in the labor force, plant and equipment per worker was about 9 percent less at the end of 1947 than at the beginning of 1929. It was even slightly less than nearly 30 years earlier in 1919. Until 1929, plant and equipment in industry had been increasing at between 10 percent and 15 percent a decade. New investment of about $60,000,000,000 is needed to bring plant and equipment per worker up to the level that would be normal in view of the long-term tendency for capital per worker to increase."

The reimposition of an excess-profits tax, after it had been abandoned in 1945 under the administration then in power, was proposed in the Senate as an amendment to the 1948 income-tax-reduction bill. It was defeated by a vote of 58 to 26. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, March 19, 1948, p. 3159.)

Now in assessing the value of the President's proposal, it is relevant to review some of the opinions of outstanding fiscal experts of the Democratic Party.

The late Honorable Carter Glass, while Secretary of the Treasury under President Wilson, in his annual report of 1919 (pp. 23–24), recommended the repeal of the World War I excess-profits tax. He stated:

"The Treasury's objections to the excess-profits tax even as a war expedient (in contradistinction to a war-profits tax) have been repeatedly voiced before the committees of the Congress. Still more objectionable is the operation of the excess-profits tax in peacetimes. It encourages wasteful expenditure, puts a premium on overcapitalization and a penalty on brains, energy, and enterprise, discourages new ventures and confirms old ventures in their monopolies. In many instances it acts as a consumption tax, is added to the cost of production upon which profits are figured in determining prices, and has been, and will, so long as it is maintained upon the statute books, continue to be a material factor in the increased cost of living."

In 1945, when the Congress was under the control of the President's party, the World War II excess-profits tax was repealed.

Secretary of the Treasury Vinson, a member of President Truman's Cabinet, and now Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court, advocated the repeal. He said (hearings, Committee on Finance, October 15, 1945, pp. 23–25, 34):

"Since the basic objective of the tax reduction at this time is to achieve and maintain a high level of employment and national income, our primary concern must be the removal of obstacles to the rapid reconversion and steady expansion of business enterprise. I consider the excess-profits tax to be a particularly important obstacle to business expansion, and I suggest its outright repeal effective January 1, 1946, instead of retention until January 1, 1947, as provided in the House bill.

"Repealing the excess-profits tax means getting out of the tax system a tax which certainly in its present form has no place in the peacetime system.

"The case against the excess-profits tax for 1946 goes beyond the facts that it is primarily a wartime control and that it is erratic and inequitable. It is also an obstacle to that reconversion and expansion of business which is so necessary for a high level of employment and income.

* * * * *

"Clearly, the repeal of the excess-profits tax will stimulate production. Today we are starved for new houses, new cars, new radios, and the like. The best defense against the use of our wartime savings to bid up prices on these scarce items is to remove the scarcity. Production, and more production, is the key. To this end, elimination of the repressive influence of the excess-profits tax will make a real contribution.

* * * * *

"Yet, despite its contribution to the successful operation of a wartime economy, the excess-profits tax has been an erratic and in many instances an inequitable tax. The difficulty is that calling profits excessive does not make them excessive. Calling profits normal does not make them normal. Normal profits and excessive profits look alike. There is no chemical reagent to distinguish them.

"The excess-profits tax, to be sure, has a formula—a very complicated formula in its entirety—for distinguishing normal and excessive profits. But that formula is seriously defective.

"One serious defect of the excess-profits tax for the postwar period lies in the weakness of the average-earnings credit, which uses prewar profits as a measure of normal profits. A corporation may continue to earn free of excess-profits tax 95 percent as much as it averaged during the years 1936–39, and this amount is often enlarged by various relief provisions. A corporation with a high prewar earnings experience may thus earn 20 percent, 30 percent, or more on its invested capital without paying any excess-profits tax. New and rising corporations do not have the benefit of such a credit and are thus at a competitive disadvantage in relation to established long-prosperous corporations. Whatever the merits of the average-earnings credit in measuring excessive war profits, it would be grossly unfair if applied to peacetime business.

"The over-all impact which this tax is likely to have on business planning as well as business profits constitutes a serious threat to our postwar employment objectives."

The then chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, the Senator from Georgia, Mr. GEORGE, in advocating the repeal of the World War II excess-profits tax, pointed out a number of the objections to the tax in peacetime. He said (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, October 24, 1945, pp. 9947–9949):

"New, growing, and small corporations are particularly hurt by the excess-profits tax. The old established firm has a large excess-profits credit, and, therefore, has a decided competitive advantage over new and growing companies. * * * The competitive disadvantage of such a tax to a new and rising corporation is tremendous. The new and rising corporation, not having an adequate credit, pays a much heavier excess-profits tax on its current income than the old established firm. * * *

"The Treasury stated that for 1943 over 70 percent of the corporations subject to the excess-profits tax had net incomes of less than $100,000. * * * On the other hand, some of our very large corporations do not pay any excess-profits taxes. In 1943 it was estimated by the Treasury that one-third of the corporations with incomes of $1,000,000 and over did not have taxable excess profits.

"The tax also discourages risk taking, since corporations can retain only a small part of their profits. The continuance of the tax * * * will discourage new investments in both 1945 and 1946. As a result this tax will retard production.

"It should be borne in mind that only about 22,000 corporations will have net incomes of $60,000 or more in 1946, that many of these 22,000 corporations will be benefited through the repeal of the excess-profits tax. * * * It is estimated that of the 260,000 corporations with net incomes for 1946, 238,000 will have incomes below $60,000. While some of these will be benefited through the repeal, * * * it is believed desirable to extend further relief through a reduction in the ordinary corporation rate."

Now we may summarize:

1. Excess-profits taxes would seriously impair the vitally important and irreplaceable ability of industry to plow profits back into increased production.

2. The profits of industry are the most important and indispensable source of capital for increasing production and therefore to restrict profits is to restrict production.

3. Profits when considered in their inseparable context—in relation to factors such as volume of business, taxes, wages, investment, risk, inventory, replacement cost, and in the perspective of past experience, are not excessive.

4. The system of excess-profits taxes restricts production not only because it operates directly to restrict the formation of capital necessary for the purpose but because by its inherent restrictive nature—"it encourages wasteful expenditure, puts a premium on overcapitalization and a penalty on brains, energy, and enterprise, discourages new ventures, and confirms old ventures in their monopolies * * * is a material factor in the increased cost of living."

5. Excess-profits taxes are unjust and arbitrary as well as regressive—because it is impossible to devise a formula for such taxes which will distinguish between high profits for high risk and sheer greed—which will distinguish fairly between small and large businesses—between starting businesses and those which are well entrenched—between the hundreds of thousands of differing circumstances affecting all who operate in our highly complex economy.

In presenting the views already noted of great Democratic fiscal experts during the debate of the defeated excess-profits-tax amendment to which I have referred, I made some remarks which I repeat as my conclusion (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, March 19, 1948, p. 3159):

"I remind my colleagues that we took this very courageous action in 1945 (repeal of wartime excess-profits tax) because we wanted to liberate the profits of corporations so that they could use them for expansion to cover the reconversion period. It has had precisely that effect. Had we continued the excess-profits taxes, I do not know where we would have obtained our money for expanding plants during this period. The evidence before the committee and, I think, the discussion here, shows that risk capital has dried up. Corporations have been financing themselves through their own fat, and through the addition of indebtedness rather than through risk investment.

"I suggest that this effort to reimpose the excess-profits-tax system is the antithesis of what we are trying to do, and should be defeated."

The Gettysburg Address Commemorative Stamp

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement prepared by me on Public Law 809 of the Eightieth Congress, directing the Postmaster General to issue on November 19, 1948, a special series of 3-cent stamps commemorating the eighty-fifth anniversary of Lincoln's Gettysburg Address.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS, OF PENNSYLVANIA, ON THE GETTYSBURG ADDRESS COMMEMORATIVE STAMP

On November 19, 1948, the Post Office Department will issue a special series of 3-cent stamps commemorating the eighty-fifth anniversary of Lincoln's Gettysburg Address.

This will, of course, be a great occasion for the people of Gettysburg, Pa. It will also be a great occasion, however, for all Americans who consider the short address delivered by President Lincoln on Gettysburg battlefield 3 months and 16 days after the withdrawal of the opposing armies to be perhaps the greatest and most noble expression of the meaning of the American way of life.

Senate Joint Resolution 158 was introduced by me on November 20, 1947, soon after the special session following the end of the first regular session of the Eightieth Congress was convened by the call of President Truman. This resolution was the culmination of proposals put forward by a number of prominent citizens of Gettysburg and vicinity for a fitting means of observing the eighty-fifth anniversary of the historic event in Gettysburg.

Among those who actively aided in the promotion of this resolution were Paul L. Roy, editor of the Gettysburg Times; Robert Fortenbaugh, of Gettysburg, president of the Pennsylvania Historical Association; Jesse E. Snyder, past department commander of the Pennsylvania Department of Sons of Union Veterans of the Civil War; and also T. J. Winebrenner, commander, and William L. Meals, secretary, and other officials and members of Gettysburg Camp No. 112 of the Sons of Union Veterans of the Civil War; Ralph E. Barley, secretary, and other members of the Lions Club of Gettysburg; George E. Burgner, secretary, and fellow members of Gettysburg Lodge 1045 of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks; Fred G. Klunk of New Oxford, Pa., and the Honorable John Rice, of Gettysburg, Democratic nominee for governor of Pennsylvania in 1946.

Although I have singled out these individuals and organizations for special mention in connection with this stamp issue, it is only fair to say that the entire community of Gettysburg and many individuals throughout the State and Nation effectively aided in promoting the passage of the resolution.

I sincerely hope to be able to be present in Gettysburg on November 19 when this special series of stamps is first issued. I know it will be a memorable occasion. The people of Gettysburg have lived in such close spiritual proximity to the historic events which occurred a short distance from their town square that the traditions of American freedom have become enshrined in the hearts of each Gettysburger from his earliest days.

Although the Post Office Department generally prefers to issue commemorative stamps only on anniversaries occurring in multiples of 50 years, the Congress determined that the eighty-fifth anniversary of Lincoln's Gettysburg Address was an anniversary of sufficient importance to warrant the passage of this legislation. In view of the fact that hundreds of requests are made annually for the issuance of commemorative stamps, nearly all of them meritorious, the Post Office Department, of necessity, had to adopt an arbitrary policy in order to limit the number of such stamps in line with practical and mechanical considerations. However, as the report of the Senate Committee on Post Office and Civil Service pointed out, after giving due attention to the objections raised by the Post Office Department, the mechanical difficulties in this instance were far outweighed "by the desire of the citizens to join through a central department of the Government in a visual and universal medium for recognizing the historical value of recalling the part played in American history by the recognized turning point in the war of the 1860's." The committee, therefore, recommended adoption of the resolution, the Senate concurred, as did the House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service and the House of Representatives, and the legislation was signed by President Truman on June 29, 1948.

Memorandum on Displaced Persons Act of 1948, Public Law 774, Eightieth Congress

HON. FRANCIS E. WALTER
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, the difficult human problem of the displaced persons is not one of our own making. It is a direct aftermath of the war, one more of those stupendous problems facing us in Europe and Asia after the victory.

In 1945, on VE-day, this problem involved over 8,000,000 people displaced during the war and brought into what we call now the western zones of occupation in Germany, Austria, and Italy by the Germans as forced laborers, prisoners of war, concentration camp inmates, and those who fled before the approaching occupation armies of the Communist dictatorship.

It was generally assumed in 1945 that as soon as the shooting stopped and transportation became available, practically all of the displaced persons would be eager to return to their former homes in order to participate in the reconstruction of their devastated countries.

Indeed, the western allied armies succeeded in repatriating to their countries of origin over seven million, but the "hard core" of displaced persons who refused to be returned to their countries now subject to the Soviet authority or the rule of the Communist-dominated satellite governments remain the problem to be solved by the western world and the United States, as one of the occupying powers, in particular.

Moreover, early in 1946 a considerable number of new refugees, mostly Jews, fleeing from their eastern European homelands in fear of political or religious persecution, began to arrive in the western portions of Germany and Austria and into Italy occupied by the democratic powers. It is for this reason that despite energetic and efficient repatriation the figure of displaced persons never fell below the 1,000,000 mark until late in 1947, when a scheme of resettlement of displaced persons in several immigrant receiving countries began to bear fruits.

The viewpoint of the Soviet Government and its satellites and the viewpoint of the western democratic powers were in sharp disagreement whenever the problem of displaced persons came up for consideration in the various international organizations, including the United Nations. The Soviet Government and its satellites maintain that all displaced persons should be repatriated and that coercion should be used if necessary. The American viewpoint and the viewpoint of other democratic countries like Great Britain, France, and others was that it is against democratic tradition and against the democratic concept of human freedom to compel these persons to return against their will to areas under governments whose political or economic system they are unwilling to accept.

This argument came into the open with particular force when the International Refugee Organization was created by the United Nations General Assembly in 1946, overruling the opposition of Soviet Russia and its satellites. The responsibility for the care and maintenance, housing, voluntary repatriation and resettlement of displaced persons was placed in the hands of the International Refugee Organization.

In the words of Gen. George C. Marshall, the Secretary of State:

> The displaced persons cannot be abandoned to the German economy. There is quite naturally a fierce resentment between the displaced persons and the Germans who are responsible for their present plight. The Germans regard the displaced persons as a burden. To turn the displaced persons back to the Germans would increase the present difficulties in Germany. It would increase the international tension and the economic difficulties in the already overcrowded areas of western Germany.

To continue indefinitely the maintenance of the displaced-persons camps in Germany, Austria, and Italy with a prolonged contribution from the American taxpayer for their support through the International Refugee Organization was another possibility General Marshall was unwilling to accept and there is no doubt that this possibility is not acceptable to the American taxpayer.

The third possibility, as outlined by General Marshall, was to provide the necessary ways and means for resettlement of displaced persons in the various countries of the world which will be willing to receive them.

The United States is one of such countries and it has been repeatedly stated by the highest public officials in charge of the displaced-persons problem that not until the United States takes the lead in the resettlement of the displaced persons will other countries of the world cooperate in the operation of such a large-scale resettlement scheme.

After several congressional investigations on the spot and after extensive hearings, the Displaced Persons Act of 1948—the United States contribution to the solution of the displaced-persons problem—has been enacted.

The Displaced Persons Act of 1948, Public Law 774, Eightieth Congress, authorizes the admission into the United States for permanent residence 220,000 displaced persons. This over-all figure could be broken down as follows:

(a) Two hundred thousand displaced persons who were forcibly brought into Germany, Austria, or Italy for slave labor, as concentration-camp inmates, prisoners of war, and so forth, or who fled into Germany from eastern Europe in fear of the Soviet Army after it pushed back the Germans.

The controversial date of December 22, 1945, as it appears in the new Displaced Persons Act represents the concept that those who were displaced during the war and not after the war should be offered the first opportunities to immigrate into the United States. The date of April 21, 1947, which appears in the bill passed by the House, represented the concept that refugees who fled from their countries after the shooting stopped are also bona fide refugees from religious and political persecution and they should not be cut off from opportunities to find a haven in the United States.

(b) Two thousand natives of Czechoslovakia who fled that country as a direct result of persecution or fear of persecution after the Communists had taken over that country in February 1948.

(c) Three thousand orphans under the age of 16 who, on or before the effective date of the new act—June 25, 1948—were in Italy, or in the American, British, or French zones of Germany or Austria.

(d) Fifteen thousand aliens temporarily admitted to the United States prior to April 1, 1948, as visitors, diplomats, foreign government officials, students, and so forth, who can show cause that they are afraid to return to their native countries because of fear of persecution. Such individuals may be permitted to remain in the United States permanently and become citizens eventually if the Attorney General finds that they qualify under the provisions of the law, and if the Congress passes a concurrent resolution approving such action.

The new act does not in any way destroy or run counter to our existing quota system. Every displaced person, except the 3,000 orphans, will be charged to the immigration quotas of their respective countries of origin as provided by existing law. It is important, however, to know that the displaced persons will be admitted within the next two fiscal years and the operation of charging them against existing quotas will take place gradually in the succeeding years so that 50 percent of the quotas will be left open for current immigration cases, while the other 50 percent will be mortgaged for such time as the last of the admitted displaced persons will be properly charged to the current quota.

In order to prevent further crowding of our big cities, particularly in the East, the new act gives preference to farmers and persons of certain other skills—like household and construction workers—who will be resettled in rural areas rather than in metropolitan centers.

A special commission to be known as the Displaced Persons Commission, consisting of three members to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, will have the responsibility of making sure that displaced persons admitted into this country shall not become public charges, and that they will have jobs and safe and sanitary housing without displacing some other person from such housing. The Commission will report semiannually to the Congress on the operation of the new act. The Commission will also issue detailed regulations which, it is hoped, will provide for a smooth operation of the new law.

There are two additional features of the new act worth mentioning:

First. Displaced persons to be admitted under this law are supposed to be qualified for immigration under all other provisions of the existing law; second, German and Austrian immigration quotas will be made available for eligible applicants for immigration, but until July 1, 1950, one-half of the current German and Austrian quotas will be made available for persons of German ethnic origin who were expelled from countries now located behind what is known as the iron curtain.

The law also provides for stiff penalties for violation of any of its provisions.

MAIN DIFFERENCES BETWEEN H. R. 6396 AND PUBLIC LAW 774

First. The cut-off date, December 22, 1945—April 21, 1947, in the House measure—excludes from admission into the United States all refugees from eastern Europe who reached the western zones of occupation in 1946 and through the first quarter of 1947. There are approximately 128,000 Jews from Rumania, Hungary, and Poland in this group of postwar refugees.

Second. The House bill provided for a proportionate allocation of American immigration visae according to the numbers and percentages of various nationals and religious groups among the displaced persons.

Public Law 774 does not provide for such an equitable system of distribution of immigration opportunities but establishes two rather stiff priorities under which 30 percent of those admitted should be farmers and 40 percent of the immigrants will be those who were born in countries annexed by Soviet Russia—Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, and the eastern part of Poland.

Third. Under the House bill the granting of the status of permanent residence for 15,000 refugees already in this country on temporary permits would be final if the Attorney General would declare them eligible.

Under the provisions of Public Law 774 the Attorney General's ruling is conditional and subject to approval by the Congress.

The latest figures supplied by the International Refugee Organization show the following number of displaced persons as of May 31, 1948:

Germany	650,993
Austria	101,693
Italy	25,158
Total	777,844

The corresponding totals were:

January 1, 1948	836,989
January 1, 1947	1,037,404

Did the New Deal Raise Farm Prices?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLIFFORD R. HOPE

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, Candidate Harry S. Truman apparently sees no connection between high food prices and high farm prices. He says the Republican Congress is responsible for high food prices and, in the same breath, takes great credit to himself and the Democratic Party because farm prices are high.

Mr. Truman seems to have conveniently forgotten that there was a World War between September 1939 and August 1945, and that this country was in it for almost 4 years. War and reconstruction demands for food and other farm products, both at home and abroad, have increased farm prices—a clear case of the operation of the law of supply and demand. The Democratic administrations of Franklin D. Roosevelt and Harry S. Truman had nothing to do with it except retard it temporarily during the war with price ceilings and inflationary consumers' subsidies, while wages kept climbing.

The true measure of the accomplishments of the Roosevelt and Truman administrations in raising and stabilizing farm prices is to be found, not in the inflation of the war years, but in the record of what took place in the seven full years of their agricultural program before wartime conditions started the price spiral.

Farm commodities in 1940, after 7 years of the New Deal farm program, were not only still far below the prices received by farmers in the 10 years 1920-29, but were also on the average only 90.6 percent as much as farmers received for their products in their first full depression year 1930, and were even below the average established by the New Deal itself in the years 1935-39.

Nineteen hundred and forty was not the low point in agricultural prices. The low postdepression level of farm prices was reached in 1939. Nineteen hundred and forty was the first full year in which the ascending scale of prices brought on by world-wide war conditions was reflected in agricultural prices. It bears a relationship to our wartime-price cycle, comparable to the relationship of the year 1930 to the depression-price cycle.

In spite of increased prices brought on by world conditions, however, in the case of only 6 of 21 commodities usually listed in farm-price comparisons were farmers receiving as much for their products in 1940 as they were in 1930. In 1940 the price received by farmers for 20 of these 21 major products was still below the average received in the years 1920–29. The only exception was beef cattle, in which there had been a consistently upward trend in prices for several decades. For all 21 of these commodities farmers were receiving in 1940 only 65 percent of the price they received on the average in the 1920's.

I am submitting, as a part of these remarks, a chart showing prices received by farmers for 21 principal commodities for the following periods: Average 1920–29, 1930, average 1935–39, 1940; also figures showing the 1940 price as a percentage of 1920–29, 1930, and 1935–39.

A glance at these figures, and particularly the last column, will show that under the New Deal farm program farm prices not only failed to reach the level of the twenties or 1930, but that the administration was not even able to keep prices up to its own low-price level established during the years 1935–39. This comparison of 1940 prices with those for the years 1935–39 shows that in 1940 farmers were receiving only 88 percent as much for these 21 commodities as they received during those 5 years; and that only three out of the twenty-one were worth as much to farmers in 1940 as they had been on the average in the years 1935–39. These three commodities are all livestock products, on which there has been a consistent upward trend for many years.

The figures used in this table were obtained from the Department of Agriculture and have been carefully checked. The table follows herewith:

Prices received by farmers—season average 1930 and 1940 with comparisons

Stronger Rent Controls Are Necessary

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement prepared by me on the need for stronger rent controls, along with a news article from the publication of the International Association of Machinists, entitled "Rents Are Going Up and Up Despite Efforts To Hold Line."

There being no objection, the statement and article were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS, OF PENNSYLVANIA, ON THE NEED FOR STRONGER RENT CONTROLS

While the cost of living has been spiraling to the highest levels in history, rents have also been rising for the American people, but the rise is not as spectacular as in other essential needs and the public is not generally as aware of the need for stronger rent controls as it is of the need for controls on other commodities, and cost-of-living items. But the need for stronger rent controls definitely exists, as thousands of tenants can attest.

One reason we do not hear so much about rising rents is that when they do occur, they do not hit a whole community at one time, as does an increase in other prices, but are rather personal matters for the individuals so affected. There are, however, thousands and thousands of Americans who have personally felt the impact of high rents or eviction, and no one can help them because of the sort of rent-control legislation the Republican-controlled Eightieth Congress has twice enacted.

I am referring to the rents being charged for new construction which is completely out from under rent control, or for accommodations which were exempted from rent control because they were off the rental market for 2 years, or for other types of shelter which were decontrolled by the Republican Congress.

Now, we must understand that the actual vacancy rate for habitable dwellings offered for rent in the United States—nonfarm dwellings—was, according to recent figures made public by the Bureau of Census, less than one-half of 1 percent.

Obviously, then, there is need for rent control. Otherwise, the tenants of America would be subject to a reign of terror and of gouging the like of which we have never seen, from a small but ruthless minority of unscrupulous landlords. For housing is basic; a father would pay any price asked of him to provide shelter for his family. Our people would be made poor overnight merely to buy their shelter. Many thousands have already been bled white by rental operators seeking to squeeze the last possible dollar out of a defenseless tenant.

The willingness of tenants to pay almost any price in their desperation for housing has also encouraged some unscrupulous landlords to evict present tenants under one loophole or another provided in the present inadequate control act, and then rent the accommodations to someone else at a fat bonus or an illegal overcharge.

The first break in effective rent control in the United States occurred as a result of the passage of the so-called Housing and Rent Act of 1947, which was sometimes more accurately described as the "rent decontrol act." Despite clearcut warnings of what would happen through the passage of that act, the Republican-controlled Congress rammed this law onto the statute books at the very last minute before rent controls were to expire. Let us take a look at what has happened as a result of some of the provisions of that act:

First, the act decontrolled all housing constructed after February 1, 1947. A survey conducted by housing officials showed that for 2,048 units constructed after February 1, 1947, to which rent control did not apply, the average monthly rent was found to be 69 percent higher than the average for comparable units under rent control. This figure is based on reports from 77 cities in 17 States.

The Housing and Rent Act of 1947 decontrolled housing units not rented between February 1, 1945, and February 1, 1947. On the basis of reports from 127 cities in 27 States on 717 such housing units, the average monthly rent was found to be 64 percent above the average for comparable housing still under rent control.

The Republican rent decontrol acts of 1947 and 1948 continued existing machinery for the decontrol of areas where rent control may not be necessary, but omit any authority to recontrol an area that has once been decontrolled. Thus, in case renewed military activity should lead to the return of acute housing shortages in some of these areas, the Government would be completely powerless to protect incoming workers and personnel against exorbitant rents.

The two Republican rent decontrol acts of this Congress provided for the so-called voluntary 15-percent rent increases. As a result, we find that every time occupancy changes in a controlled dwelling, whether or not the previous tenant had agreed to such a lease, the new tenant is required to. In some apartment houses some tenants are paying the original ceiling rent plus whatever individual rent increase the landlord may have been given permission to make to cover rising operating costs. Other tenants will be paying a higher rent under the 15-percent lease. Still other tenants may be occupying quarters which were decontrolled entirely because they had become vacant under odd circumstances prior to the enactment of the present act this year and the rents in these quarters would reflect whatever the traffic would bear. This situation is hardly fair, yet it is the pattern laid down as a result of Republican bungling on rent-control legislation both in 1947 and 1948.

One of the worst failures of the Republican Congress on rent control was in not providing adequate enforcement machinery. Prior to July 1, 1947, a tenant victimized by an unscrupulous landlord demanding and insisting on an illegal overcharge could go to the Federal rent officials and enlist their assistance in obtaining a refund amounting to triple the damages or $50, whichever was higher. The Republican Congress eliminated this provision. The tenant may sue his landlord in his own right, but the Government cannot sue for him. The Government, however, can negotiate for return to the tenant of the amount of the overcharge and no more.

As many of us warned at the time these provisions were enacted, they would be virtually valueless in curbing illegal rent overcharges for the simple reason that few tenants have the courage to risk the vengeance of their landlords by suing them in their own right, while the Housing Expediter has no punitive powers and all he could do would be to get back for the tenant the actual amount of the overcharge. This situation acts virtually as an invitation to unscrupulous landlords to seek overcharges since, as a practical matter, the worst thing that could happen to them would be a requirement that they return the overcharge. Under the first Republican rent decontrol act, the Housing Expediter had neither injunctive nor criminal prosecution powers against perennial violators of the act. His powers now are still drastically limited.

And so we find an increasing number of overceiling violations as proved by the fact that Bureau of Labor Statistics show rents rising substantially above levels they would have reached if all rent increases were legally sanctioned. Tenants are restrained from bringing suits against their landlord by fear of blacklistings, eviction, or other retaliation. The Republican rent decontrol acts provide several nice loopholes for eviction of a tenant and it is up to the local courts to decide whether a landlord seeking an eviction is doing so in good faith. Evictions go to the very heart of rent control and obviously a so-called rent control act which puts a premium on evasive practices in obtaining evictions cannot be effective.

Fortunately, we were able in the Senate, by a vote of 43 to 25, to prevent the writing into the present act of a provision requiring the Expediter to follow blindly and unquestioningly the recommendations of any of the local advisory boards scattered throughout the country. As I told the Senate at the time the issue was before us, that was the test vote to determine whether we were going to have any rent control at all. Although the House of Representatives originally passed a bill granting this so-called home rule on rent control, the Senate stood by our earlier position and refused to go along. The wisdom of our stand was effectively demonstrated shortly thereafter in one noteworthy instance in Pennsylvania. The local advisory board at Indiana County, Pa., without holding hearings or otherwise attempting to get substantive evidence, recommended complete decontrol. The Housing Expediter, in investigating this recommendation, found overwhelming evidence of the shortage of housing at and in the vicinity of Indiana, Pa., and therefore determined that decontrol would work a tremendous hardship on the tenants of that area. The recommendation was therefore denied.

Yet, if the Republican-dominated House of Representatives had had its way on this issue, Indiana County, Pa., would, of necessity, have been decontrolled despite the acute shortage of housing in that area.

I have outlined some of the faults of present rent-control regulations. They show the need for the following strengthening revisions:

1. Recontrol on the same basis as other property of new construction (with suitable and fair allowance for increasing construction costs) and of property which had become decontrolled by virtue of the fact that it was not on the rental market for a consecutive 2-year period between 1945 and the present time.

2. Restore authority where necessary to recontrol areas which have been decontrolled.

3. Restore enforcement provisions adequate to meet the challenge of illegal overcharges.

4. Place eviction matters again under Federal authority so as to provide for uniform practices and so as to grant the tenant protection against retaliatory evictions.

There is ample opportunity for a landlord deserving of a so-called hardship rent increase to obtain one commensurate with increasing operating costs. Because the damage has already been done, the problem of dealing equitably with tenant and landlord alike in future legislation involving the voluntary rent increases is a difficult one, but it seems to me that these increases have, in most cases, been negotiated under the duress of the housing shortage and have been voluntary only to the extent that the landlords insisted upon them and the tenants felt obliged to submit for fear of eviction or from fear that the Republican-controlled Congress would allow rent control to end prematurely in order to favor the real-estate interests.

Democratic Congress next year will be pledged to enact effective rent-control legislation to meet the need at that time.

In view of the recommendations I have made for strengthening rent control, I include herewith a statement issued by me more than a year ago, on July 26, 1947, at the time I introduced S. 1741. This statement outlining my bill shows the kind of rent control we would now enjoy if this bill, rather than the watered-down Republican decontrol bill had been enacted. This statement follows:

"STATEMENT BY SENATOR FRANCIS J. MYERS, OF PENNSYLVANIA, UPON INTRODUCING BILL TO EXTEND RENT CONTROL FOR A YEAR BEYOND FEBRUARY 29, 1948, AND TO AMEND DECONTROL PROVISIONS OF PRESENT ACT

"In submitting this bill to extend rent control for a year beyond its present terminal date of February 29, 1948, I recognize, first and foremost, that some of the damage done to effective rent control by the Wolcott Act now in effect is irreparable. The experience we had with OPA last year when Congress decontrolled many items, including meat, and then gave authority for their recontrol, proved how difficult it is to restore controls once they are abandoned under selfish pressures.

"In the case of rents, however, it is still possible now, and will be possible even a few months from now, without any significant dislocation or hardship, to restore some of the controls which were removed by the Housing and Rent Control Act enacted last June at the very last moment.

"My bill is based on the assumption that the present housing shortage will not be substantially alleviated by next March 1, when present controls are to expire. In addition to extending those present controls for another year, it also represents an attempt to correct some of the worst features of the present act as they were rammed through Congress on the very eve of the scheduled expiration of the previous law, and sent to the White House on a take-it-or-leave-it basis, giving the President the choice of a bad Rent Control Act or no rent control at all beginning July 1, last.

"Since many tenants will have signed voluntary 15-percent rent increases, leases under this act for fear of being evicted or made subject to terrifically higher increases next March, this bill recognizes the validity of all such leases in existence as of January 1, 1948, since there is little, if anything, which could be done about the situation now. I should like, however, to see enough Members of Congress announce publicly in the near future their intention to support a continuation of rent control after next March 1 that tenants who are not convinced of the justification of a 15-percent rent increase in their cases can feel secure in not signing such leases. At present they feel, in many cases, that there is a loaded gun pointed at their heads, and the gun is labeled 'No rent control at all after March 1.'

"My bill would—

"1. Bring back under rent control in all defense-rental areas all housing accommodations subject to regulation under the act which expired last June 30, except hotels (for transients), tourist houses (for transients), and motor courts.

"2. Recontrol new construction, which was decontrolled under the Wolcott Act, but it would instruct the Housing Expediter to make 'due allowance for appropriate adjustments' in setting rents for new construction taking into consideration the fact that the builder or owner may have proceeded to build on the assumption that these dwellings would not be subject to rent control and that his construction costs may have been higher than they otherwise would have been.

"3. Recontrol units converted after February 1, 1947, on the same basis as 'new construction' units.

"4. Restore to the Housing Expediter authority in those cases he deems it necessary to recontrol areas which have already been decontrolled, and to put under rent control any areas which have never had rent control but which, in his judgment, should be placed under rent control. Both of these powers were removed by the Wolcott Act.

"5. Continue the rent advisory boards established under the Wolcott Act, including their authority to recommend decontrol by areas, to recommend over-all rent increases by areas, and to make recommendations on general operational practices and regulations in their areas, but it would remove the present authority of these boards to consider individual rent adjustment cases and to make recommendations to local rent officials on these individual cases. The Housing Expediter, of course, would retain his present authority to accept or reject the recommendations of these advisory boards.

"6. Restore all enforcement provisions of the act which expired last June 30, including criminal sanctions and the right of the Housing Expediter to sue for triple damages in cases of rent overcharges. The present law omits these features.

"7. Restore to the Expediter power he no longer has to issue regulations concerning evictions, including the reestablishment of a required waiting period before eviction occurs. The present law leaves eviction matters subject only to State law.

"8. Reestablish the exclusive jurisdiction procedure over orders and regulations of the Housing Expediter on rent matters in the Emergency Court of Appeals. Under present law enacted last June 30, orders and regulations of the Housing Expediter on rent matters can be attacked in any State or Federal court following exhaustion of appeal machinery through administrative channels.

"9. Continue powers which the Housing Expediter now has to issue regulations covering hardship cases as well as to order general rent increases by areas or nationally, where he finds them necessary to fair and equitable administration of rent control.

"I feel it is too bad that the Congress would not agree last month to a rent control extension act which would merely continue then existing regulations. There was ample provision in the previous law for landlords suffering hardship to obtain rent increases, and thousands of them received such increases. Now that the damage has been done by enactment of a bad bill, the best we can do now is repair the damage whenever it is possible to do so while assuring a continuation of controls, even if they are relaxed as they have been. This bill seeks to accomplish those purposes."

I also submit as part of my statement today an article from the Machinist dated August 5, 1948, explaining what has happened to rents under the Republican decontrol acts. The International Association of Machinists has been one of the most effective organizations in the Nation in highlighting the importance to the public and to our economy of adequate rent-control and inflation-control legislation.

This article follows:

"RENTS ARE GOING UP AND UP DESPITE EFFORTS TO HOLD LINE

"Despite the continuation of rent controls last April, rents have been creeping steadily higher—and the prospect is that they will go still higher before they start going down.

"Although Paul Porter, who succeeded Chester Bowles as OPA Director at the end of the war, has been called back to direct the new drive on inflation, Government experts say that the real determining factor on how much higher rents will go depends upon the kind of Congress that is elected next November.

"If the new Congress favors a strengthening of rent controls, rents can probably be held in line, except for increases granted in hardship cases.

"If the new Congress yields to the demands of the real-estate lobby, rents can be expected to rise sharply, and if all controls are abandoned, they will probably rise about 70 percent over the present level.

"Recent increases in rent have been due to the relative ease with which landlords can get permission to boost their rents in so-called hardship cases and to other loopholes in the rent-control law.

"The law specifies 13 grounds under which landlords are entitled to higher rent. They include cases in which landlords have made major capital improvements to the property, such as adding another room; increased services; special relationship cases in which the landlord formerly rented to a friend or relative at less than market value but now wishes to charge a higher rent; cases in which tenants take in roomers; proof that the landlord is operating at a loss, and proof that he is not now making as much money as he did when rents were frozen.

"How these provisions are operating to raise rents is shown by official figures of the Office of Housing Expediter. Landlords are now making applications for higher rents at the rate of 1,000,000 a year, and 70 percent of them are being granted.

"No official figures have been compiled on the amounts of such increases, but they run all the way from a nominal 10 to 15 percent to as much as 100 percent or more in extreme cases.

"Last January 36,000 hardship applications for higher rent were docketed, and 28,000 of them were approved. In June, the latest month for which figures are available, 47,000 hardship cases were docketed and 32,000 approved.

"Other loopholes in the rent-control law that are resulting in higher rents are the exemption of rooming houses, hotels, and all new construction from controls, and the provision granting landlords the right to demand 15-percent increases in return for leases running through 1949.

"Hotel rates for weekly and monthly guests have gone up all the way from 150 to 200 percent and the rates on a day-to-day basis have jumped from 5 to 50 percent. Roominghouse rents have advanced from 5 to 25 percent.

"The Labor Department estimates that rents have gone up about 7 percent in the last year, and Government housing officials can see little prospect of a reversal of this trend in view of rising prices and the failure of the new housing program to meet its goals."

The President's Midyear Budget Review: Republican Rich-Relief Income and Estate-Tax-Reduction Bill Will Create Operating Deficit of $1,500,000,000 in Fiscal Year 1949

OF

HON. HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mrs. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following detailed break-down of the operating deficit of $1,500,000,000 for fiscal year 1949 created by the enactment of the Republican rich-relief income and estate-tax-reduction bill over the veto of the President:

PARTIAL TEXT OF STATEMENT BY THE PRESIDENT REVIEWING THE 1949 BUDGET

NATIONAL DEFENSE

Expenditures for national defense are now estimated at $12,100,000,000 for the fiscal year 1949, an increase of $1,100,000,000 above the January estimate and $1,500,000,000 above the amount spent in 1948. The increase since the budget was transmitted in January reflects the initial impact upon budget expenditures of the expanded military program enacted last spring.

Within the total of $12,100,000,000 in estimated expenditures for the national defense program, $4,800,000,000, or 40 percent, will be spent for the pay and maintenance of military personnel.

Expenditures in other defense categories for fiscal 1949 are projected at an increased rate over 1948. Payments for aircraft procurement in 1949 will increase by $520,000,000 to a total of $1,300,000,000. Expenditures for procurement of ordnance and other equipment and supplies are also expected to rise. Payments for strategic materials for the stock-piling program are estimated to increase from $84,000,000 in 1948 to $300,000,000 this fiscal year.

Increased authorizations for 1949 will result in still higher expenditures in 1950. The trend of expenditures beyond 1949 is indicated by the fact that appropriations and contract authorizations enacted amount to $14,300,000,000, including $2,900,000,000 made available late in the fiscal year 1948. This compares with my recommendation of $10,900,000,000 in the January budget, plus more than $3,800,000,000 of increased recommendations which I submitted during the spring to meet our changed security requirements in the light of world conditions. Thus, there was a net reduction of $400,000,000 below my recommended authorizations.

The Congress made certain revisions and changes in my recommendations, resulting in a net increase of $110,000,000. Increases of $880,000,000 were authorized, above my recommendations, principally for aircraft procurement for the Air Force. New authority enacted for other military programs was $770,000,000 less than I requested.

On the other hand, this review omits appropriations of $500,000,000 tentatively included in the January estimates for the proposed universal training program, which was not enacted. However, a new program for training 161,000 18-year-old voluntary enlistees was enacted and authority granted to cover initial expenses from the appropriations already made for the National Military Establishment. Whether or not supplemental appropriations for this new program will be necessary can only be determined by later reviews of the military program.

INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS AND FINANCE

Expenditures for international aid programs are now estimated at $7,000,000,000—the same as in January. Actual expenditures in 1948 were $4,700,000,000.

More than half of all international expenditures in the fiscal year 1949 will be required for aid to Europe under the Economic Cooperation Act. In January expenditures for this program were estimated at $4,000,000,000 for 1949; they are now estimated at $3,800,000,000. This downward revision results largely from the congressional reduction of the initial appropriation by $245,000,000.

Expenditures for Greek-Turkish aid in 1949 are now projected at $385,000,000—$181,000,000 above the January budget—largely due to shipments and payments delayed from the fiscal year 1948.

Estimated expenditures for aid to China in 1949 have been revised upward, from $240,000,000 to $359,000,000, to reflect the increased program enacted since last January.

Expenditures under the Army's program for relief and reconstruction in the occupied areas are now expected to total $1,280,000,000—a reduction of $70,000,000 since January. This decline is mainly in the reconstruction portion of the program.

Although the Congress reduced the recommended authorization for the European aid program by $1,500,000,000, it provided that on recommendation by the Economic Cooperation Administrator and with my approval, the funds appropriated could be fully obligated by April 2, 1949. To permit this program to go forward without interruption during the last quarter of the fiscal year, additional authority and appropriations will probably be necessary. I am therefore including in this review a tentative estimate of $1,500,000,000 for a supplemental appropriation. Its enactment will not have a significant effect on expenditures until the fiscal year 1950.

VETERANS' SERVICES AND BENEFITS

Expenditures for veterans' programs for the fiscal year 1949 are now estimated at nearly $6,800,000,000. This is an increase of $689,000,000 over the January estimate and is $228,000,000 more than was actually spent in the fiscal year 1948.

Nearly four-fifths of the expenditures will be direct cash payments in the form of pensions and readjustment benefits, including education and training benefits.

Expenditures for readjustment benefits are now estimated at $3,200,000,000 in fiscal 1949—nearly $600,000,000 higher than in January. Most of the increase results from new laws providing increased subsistence allowances in the educational program and more liberal allowances for on-the-job trainees which will add expenditures of about $550,000,000. Furthermore, expenditures will be increased because of bigger enrollments in the education and job-training programs and higher per capita tuition costs. On the other hand, newly enacted limitations on avocational and recreational training will result in estimated savings of $100,000,000.

Expenditures for veterans' pensions, including subsistence allowances for disabled trainees, are now estimated at nearly $2,200,000,000 in fiscal 1949. New laws provide higher compensation for dependents of deceased veterans and for dependents of veterans with major disabilities. These will add an estimated $100,000,000 of expenditures during the fiscal year 1949, and larger expenditures in future years.

Two other major revisions are also made in expenditure estimates for the veterans' program. Additional transfers to the national service life insurance trust fund required by a revaluation of the Government's liabilities for war-risk cases probably will require $200,000,000 more than was estimated in January. The lag in construction of veterans' hospital and domiciliary facilities, however, results in an almost equal reduction in estimated expenditures for 1949.

Supplemental appropriations of $942,000,000 for veterans' programs are now anticipated for the remainder of the fiscal year 1949 to restore necessary amounts eliminated by the Congress and to cover the higher expenditures required by new laws and increased program needs.

SOCIAL WELFARE, HEALTH, AND SECURITY

For the fiscal year 1949, expenditures for social welfare, health, and security are now estimated at $2,000,000,000, approximately the same as in the January budget.

The budget estimates last January, however, included expenditures for putting into effect proposed legislation to provide a much more adequate program, with greater emphasis on contributory social insurance. Instead, the Congress enacted, over my vetoes, revisions which narrowed the coverage and thereby weakened the system of old-age and survivors' insurance.

Because the existing temporary provisions governing grants to States for public assistance were liberalized, the revised expenditure estimates assume a supplemental appropriation of $120,000,000 to provide these larger grants in this fiscal year.

Estimated expenditures for transfers to the railroad retirement trust account do not include $175,000,000 which would be required under present law during 1949 or 1950 to cover the military service credits earned by railroad employees. Good budgeting requires that this law be changed, so that these transfers may be made annually on the basis of claims actually approved as workers retire in the years ahead, rather than on a conjectural, lump-sum basis, estimated far in advance, as the law now requires.

HOUSING AND COMMUNITY FACILITIES

Expenditures for housing and community facilities in 1949, which were estimated at $38,000,000 last January, are now estimated at $327,000,000. Purchases of guaranteed housing mortgages by the Federal National Mortgage Association (a subsidiary of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation) are expected to be roughly $300,000,000, partly to meet commitments to purchase mortgages insured by the Federal Housing Administration, and partly under new legislation authorizing purchases of mortgages guaranteed by the Veterans' Administration. The actual amount of mortgage purchases will depend on developments in the housing and mortgage markets which cannot be accurately predicted now.

The Congress failed to enact major elements of the comprehensive housing program which I recommended and did not accept my recommendation to revive the authority of the Federal Works Agency to make advances to State and local governments for the planning of their public works. This reduces expenditure estimates by $44,000,000.

EDUCATION AND GENERAL RESEARCH

Expenditures for education and general research in fiscal 1949 are now estimated at $86,000,000—$301,000,000 less than in the January budget. This results primarily from congressional failure to provide general assistance for elementary and secondary education. An estimated expenditure of $290,000,000 was included for this program in the January budget. The Congress also did not establish a national science foundation, which had been expected to spend $5,000,000 this year.

AGRICULTURE AND AGRICULTURAL RESOURCES

Programs to promote agriculture and conserve and develop our agricultural resources will require expenditures of $868,000,000 in the fiscal year 1949—$30,000,000 more than the January estimate.

The Congress enacted a more flexible price-support program, such as I recommended, but postponed its effective date. This postponement will result in increased expenditures during the fiscal year 1949 above those estimated in January. This increase will be offset, however, by larger repayments on commodity loans than were previously anticipated. Increases in prices paid by farmers during the past year and a half, coupled with decreases in prices received by farmers for some agricultural commodities, such as wheat, cotton, and potatoes, have narrowed or eliminated the margin between market prices and minimum support levels. Under these circumstances, expenditure estimates in this field must be regarded as tentative.

Increased authorizations for Rural Electrification Administration loans, and higher conservation and use payments authorized for the 1949 crop year, will not materially affect expenditures until the fiscal year 1950.

NATURAL RESOURCES

The revised estimate of $1,600,000,000 for the conservation and development of our natural resources during the fiscal year 1949 is $39,000,000 below the January estimate and $491,000,000 above the 1948 level. Almost 90 percent of all expenditures for natural resources in 1949 will be devoted to atomic energy, flood control, reclamation, and power.

Expenditures for the development and control of atomic energy are estimated to be $648,000,000—$26,000,000 less than the January estimate. This change is the net effect of reductions in appropriations, offset in part by an acceleration of work already under way and expenditures for activities not anticipated in earlier estimates.

The Congress reduced appropriations on approximately one-third of the Corps of Engineers flood-control projects underway and disallowed funds for five projects, but added funds to start 22 projects not in my recommendations. The net result will be to increase expenditures substantially during future years. Appropriations for the Bureau of Reclamation were reduced, thus delaying reclamation work in the great basin areas of the West. Expenditures for these two programs in 1949 will be $24,000,000 below the January estimate.

The Congress reduced appropriations in numerous cases which will have the effect of delaying the production and transmission of power urgently needed to relieve present or anticipated shortages. It reduced appropriations for power features of a number of multiple-purpose flood control, river and harbor, and reclamation projects. The Congress denied the request of the Tennessee Valley Authority for $4,000,000 to begin construction of a steam plant, although this plant is needed to assure an adequate and flexible power supply within the TVA system. In addition it denied all appropriations for new construction in the southwestern power-transmission system.

TRANSPORTATION AND COMMUNICATION

A sharp rise in the postal deficit is the chief factor which increases Federal expenditures for transportation and communication activities $189,000,000 above the January estimate. Expenditures for this group of activities are now estimated at $1,800,000,000.

The postal deficit for the fiscal year 1949 is now estimated at $539,000,000, payable from the general fund. Last January this deficit was estimated at $321,000,000. The higher deficit is largely due to the fact that the cost of the pay raise recently enacted for post office employees will be only partly covered by the increase in postal rates provided in the same legislation. There have also been increases in the prices of materials and in transportation costs.

Changes in the outlook for road construction result in a reduction of $42,000,000 below the January estimate of expenditures for the Federal-aid highway program. Other transportation and communication programs show no significant changes in expenditure estimates for 1949.

A number of major additions to the January estimates of appropriations and authorizations have been enacted, which will not affect expenditures until the fiscal year 1950. The main increases are $470,000,000 authorized for public roads in the Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1948, and $65,000,000 provided for Maritime Commission ship construction. As in the case of flood control, appropriations for existing rivers and harbors projects were held below my recommendations, but numerous new projects were added by the Congress which will result in higher expenditures in later years.

As part of the civil-aviation program for 1949, considerable emphasis will continue to be placed upon the installation of airway and landing aids which will further improve safety and regularity of flight over the Federal airway system. While the Congress reduced recommended appropriations for the Civil Aeronautics Administration by some $57,000,000, the bulk of this reduction was offset by grants of contract authority; there will be no substantial change in estimated expenditures. The Federal airways program in 1949 will follow in general the outlines laid down in the report of the Radio Technical Commission for Aeronautics. In addition, an Air Navigation Development Board has been established to plan and coordinate research and development work required to achieve an all-weather air-traffic control and navigation system suited to joint military and civil use.

FINANCE, COMMERCE, AND INDUSTRY

Expenditures for Government programs affecting finance, commerce, and industry are now estimated at $77,000,000, a reduction of $108,000,000 from the January estimate. Most of this amount had been included in the Budget to administer an adequate anti-inflation program, which was not enacted.

Reduced estimates of Reconstruction Finance Corporation loans to business account for most of the remaining decrease.

Supplemental appropriations of $22,000,000 will be required, principally to restore cuts made in funds for the census of business and to extend the rent-control program.

LABOR

Expenditures for labor programs are now estimated at $98,000,000, $18,000,000 below the January Budget estimate. Of this decrease, $11,000,000 results from reduced appropriations for the United States Employment Service and affiliated Service employment services. Most of the remainder results from congressional failure to approve authorizing legislation for an expanded industrial safety program in the Department of Labor and for the establishment of a national commission against discrimination in employment.

GENERAL GOVERNMENT

The estimated total of expenditures for general Government in fiscal 1949 is now $1,200,000,000 dollars, $30,000,000 above the January estimate, and $203,000,000 dollars below the 1948 total. The largest expenditures in the general Government category are for collecting taxes, for disposing of surplus property and for the Government payment toward the civil service employees' retirement fund.

The reduction below 1948 is primarily due to reduced administrative expenses for disposing of surplus property, and to reduced interest payments by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation reflecting the cancellation of its war-created obligations to the Treasury.

The increase since January allows for some additions to the staff of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, to improve the administration of the tax laws. It includes also an upward revision in estimated expenditures for the return of war dead.

INTEREST ON THE PUBLIC DEBT

Interest payments on the public debt are now estimated to increase to $5,300,000,000 in the current fiscal year, or $50,000,000 higher than anticipated in the January budget.

Despite the reduction in the interest-bearing debt in 1948, interest payments will be $89,000,000 higher in 1949 than in 1948. Accruals on savings bonds will continue to rise substantially as bonds purchased during the war approach maturity. In addition, short-term interest rates have increased, and there has been a gradual shift in the composition of the debt from low-interest obligations held by banks to higher rate securities held by Government trust funds and nonbank investors.

Because some of these forces will continue to operate, the failure to achieve any debt reduction in fiscal 1949 will probably mean even higher interest payments in 1950.

REFUNDS OF RECEIPTS

Expenditures to refund overpayments of taxes and other receipts are estimated at $2,800,000,000. The estimate has been increased by $799,000,000 since January, chiefly because the Revenue Act of 1948 will require refund payments of nearly $700,000,000. The 1948 experience indicates that corporation tax refunds also will run above the levels previously expected.

PART III. RECEIPTS FROM AND PAYMENTS TO THE PUBLIC

Receipts from the public during the fiscal year 1949 are now estimated at $44,100,000,000 and payments to the public at $42,700,000,000. These totals include trust accounts as well as Budget accounts, but exclude all intra-governmental transactions. Accordingly, they show the flow of money between the Federal Government and the public.

The excess of cash receipts over cash payments in the fiscal year 1949 is now expected to be only $1,400,000,000, compared with $7,100,000,000 estimated in the January budget. This change reflects a combination of a decline of $4,200,000,000 in receipts and an increase of $1,500,000,000 in payments.

The excess of cash receipts arises largely from the accumulation of funds in the social-security trust accounts during a period of full employment. This accumulation represents a reserve for future payments of old-age, unemployment, and similar benefits.

Independence National Historical Park

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement prepared by me on Public Law 795, of the Eightieth Congress, providing for the establishment of the Independence National Historical Park in the city of Philadelphia.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS, OF PENNSYLVANIA, ON THE ESTABLISHMENT OF INDEPENDENCE NATIONAL HISTORICAL PARK

As a cosponsor of the two acts of Congress which will make of our historic Independence Hall area in Philadelphia a new national park and as a member of the Commission which investigated this matter and made the recommendations which the Congress has followed, I am exceedingly grateful for the fine cooperation which Philadelphia and Pennsylvania have been accorded on this matter.

As stated so convincingly by Chairman WELCH in the House committee report on this project, this work should have been undertaken years ago. He concluded in the committee's unanimous report: "If we are properly to preserve our historical heritage indelibly associated with the founding of the Nation, and to pass that heritage on to future generations unimpaired, it is essential that we strongly support such a great national patriotic project as is represented by the proposed Independence National Historical Park."

The congressional legislation providing for the establishment of the Independence National Historical Park in the old part of the city of Philadelphia, approved on June 28 by President Truman, represents one of the major historical conservation developments in the United States in recent decades.

This national historical park and related projects planned by the State of Pennsylvania and the city of Philadelphia to improve and beautify the surroundings of the Independence Hall group of structures in historic Independence Square will provide a fitting and permanent memorial to the principles on which this Nation was founded. Existing unsightly developments will be removed, historic sites will be made readily accessible to visitors, and present fire hazards will be reduced.

The Congress based the legislation providing for park establishment on recommendations contained in the final report of the Philadelphia National Shrines Park Commission, which was submitted to the Congress on December 29, 1947. Members of this commission were Judge Edwin O. Lewis, Philadelphia, chairman; Albert M. Greenfield, Philadelphia, vice chairman; George McAneny, New York City; Representative Robert M. McGarvey, Philadelphia, who succeeded former Representative Michael J. Bradley after the latter voluntarily retired from Congress and from the commission which his bill in the Seventy-ninth Congress had created; Judge Hugh Martin Morris, Wilmington, Del.; Senator Francis J. Myers, Philadelphia; and Dr. Carl Van Doren, of New York City.

The story of the passage of this legislation through the Congress is remarkable for the nonpartisan character of the project, identical bills having been introduced into the Congress by Republican and Democratic Members to consummate the recommendations of the Commission. The realization of the project to preserve and improve the surroundings of this cradle of American Independence and liberty therefore expresses the will of all of the Philadelphia people and all of the American people regardless of party differences.

The legislation enacted by the Congress authorizes the Secretary of the Interior "to acquire by donation or with donated funds, or to acquire by purchase" historic buildings and sites in the vicinity of Independence Hall which were intimately associated with the American Revolution and the founding and growth of the United States. A sum of not to exceed $4,435,000 is authorized to be appropriated for the acquisition of properties for the park. Approximately an equal sum has been appropriated by the State of Pennsylvania for acquisition of land for the development of a mall facing Independence Hall and coordinated in plan with the national historical park. It is understood that the State contemplates a further expenditure of an almost equal amount. The City of Philadelphia plans to finance related improvements bordering the general park area.

Under the terms of the Federal legislation, the park may be established following the consummation of certain agreements by the Secretary of the Interior with the City of Philadelphia and the Carpenters' Company of Philadelphia and when title to certain specified sites and properties, together with two-thirds of the remaining properties within the following four "projects" or areas, have been vested in the United States. These are:

1. An area of three city blocks, including land surrounding Carpenters' Hall, where the First Continental Congress met, and on which are situated the First Bank of the United States, the Second Bank of the United States (Old Philadelphia Custom House National Historic Site), the site of the old City Tavern, where Revolutionary patriots gathered, and other important sites and structures, but excluding the new United States Custom House.

2. A memorial thoroughfare or mall extending generally from the south side of Walnut Street to the north side of Manning Street.

3. Site of Franklin Court, where Benjamin Franklin had his home and print shop and where he lived when he signed the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States.

4. Certain lands and buildings immediately adjacent to Christ Church, where George Washington and many other Members of the Continental Congress and the Constitutional Convention worshiped. In the churchyard are buried many of the Founding Fathers who signed the Declaration of Independence.

The cooperative agreements to be entered into by the Secretary of the Interior and the city of Philadelphia and the Carpenters' Company of Philadelphia, prior to acquisition of property for the park will provide for the preservation and interpretation of the Independence Hall National Historic Site and Carpenters' Hall. The Independence Hall National Historic Site, designated as such by the Secretary of the Interior on May 14, 1943, under the authority of the Historic Sites Act of August 21, 1935, includes Independence Hall, Congress Hall, Old City Hall, and associated historic objects located in Independence Square. The agreements, it is pointed out in the legislation, shall contain, but not be limited to, provisions that the Secretary of the Interior, through the National Park Service, shall have right of access at all reasonable times to public portions of the properties for the purpose of conducting visitors through the buildings and grounds and interpreting them to the public. The legislation further provides that no changes or alterations shall be made in the properties except by mutual agreement between the Secretary of the Interior and the other parties to the contracts.

The Secretary of the Interior is also authorized to enter into agreement with the proprietors of Christ Church for the protection of the property, assuring its physical maintenance as a national shrine, without any limitation or control over its use for customary church purposes.

Appointment by the Secretary of the Interior of an Advisory Commission of not to exceed 11 members is specified in the legislation. Three of the members are to be recommended by the Governor of Pennsylvania, three by the mayor of Philadelphia, and one each by the Carpenters' Co. of Philadelphia and the Independence Hall Association. The remaining three members will represent the Federal Government. This Advisory Commission is expected to be appointed soon.

The original legislation, Public Law 711 of the Seventy-ninth Congress, which opened the way for the establishment of the new national park by creating the Philadelphia National Shrines Park Commission and outlining the investigation this group was to make, was signed into law by President Truman on August 9, 1946. It provided that the Commission should make a report to Congress in January 1947. Events showed that this was insufficient time in which to make a comprehensive report, and so I sponsored legislation to extend the time until January 1948.

At that time our Commission made its report. New legislation was introduced to carry out the recommendations, and the House and Senate Public Lands Committees soon took up these bills.

The House committee, in its report, made this statement:

"The true patriot will be profoundly impressed with the deep significance of Independence Hall and its surroundings as a focal point for the democratic traditions of the American people, and the committee recognizes the opportunity presented by the proposed national historical park project to perpetuate and enhance these values. It is a memorable experience to view the white-paneled room in Independence Hall, with its original desk and chairs, where the best minds of America framed and signed the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution; to view Congress Hall, a wing of the main building, where our congressional predecessors met for the decade from 1790 to 1800—10 of the most crucial years in the history of the United States; to visit the nearby American Philosophical Society Building in Independence Square, home of the oldest scientific society in America, founded in 1743 by Benjamin Franklin, whose treasures include the original copy of the Declaration of Independence in Jefferson's own handwriting, with corrections by Franklin; the equipment with which Benjamin Franklin conducted some of his famous electrical experiments; the original notebooks of Lewis and Clark, and many other priceless objects; to visit Carpenters' Hall, where the first Continental Congress met in 1774. These historic sites and buildings constitute an indispensable and irreplaceable part of our own national heritage."

Pointing out that today's visitor to Philadelphia faces "many obstacles to a clear understanding of these historic scenes which commemorate most fully and intimately the basic political ideals of the American people," the report said the new historical park, as outlined in the legislation, will remove the "blanket of urbanization" which covers the area now and obscures its historic treasures and provide "a landscape setting having the full dignity and character appropriate to the most important historic buildings in America."

Subversive of What?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ARTHUR G. KLEIN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, the national hero who, more than any other one individual, gave to the United States its fundamental form and philosophy of Government, was Thomas Jefferson. It gives me pleasure to introduce in the Congressional RECORD a portion of an article which views our contemporary drift away from freedom in terms of Jeffersonian freedom, written by Julian P. Boyd and published in the Atlantic Monthly.

A historian and editor who has been at the head of the Princeton University Library since 1940, Julian P. Boyd is a Southerner whose firm conviction it is that Americans have enough strength of mind to resist subversive doctrines—a conviction I share. Mr. Boyd has written several historical works, among them a volume on the evolution of the text of the Declaration of Independence.

SUBVERSIVE OF WHAT?

(By Julian P. Boyd)

In 1813 a native of France by the name of Regnault de Bécourt published a book entitled "Sur la Création du Monde, ou Système d'Organisation Primitive." He and his book would have been forgotten long since if he had not written a letter to the one person in America who, more than any other, was in the habit of buying, reading, and appraising the literature of the past and present—Thomas Jefferson. The title of the forthcoming work intrigued Jefferson. * * * He thereupon subscribed for the work, received it in due course, and authorized payment of the $2 that the book cost.

Authorization of payment involved another Frenchman, a well-known bookseller of Philadelphia by the name of Nicholas Dufief, an ardent bibliophile who had been selling books to Jefferson for more than a decade. * * *

But this simple book purchase was very far from being at an end. A few months after Dufief had paid Bécourt the $2, the Philadelphia constabulary visited the bookshop and hailed him into court on the charge of vending subversive if not blasphemous literature. Whereupon Dufief in great anxiety and distress appealed to Jefferson, urging him to set the minions of the law right by informing them that he, Dufief, had not actually sold the book but had merely acted as Jefferson's agent in a financial transaction.

Jefferson, of course, immediately complied with the urgent request of the bookseller. He stated the facts succinctly and accurately, no doubt satisfying both Dufief and the Philadelphia magistrates. But while this may have been enough for Mr. Dufief, who was interested only in keeping out of the toils of the law, or for the Philadelphia magistrates, who were determined only to safeguard American institutions, it was very far from being enough to satisfy the author of the American philosophy of government.

Jefferson thereupon stated in his own incomparable way the true nature of the issue involved. The issue, as he presented it, was one that made the fact of Dufief's arrest a trivial and irrelevant circumstance. It was an issue as great as the cause of America itself, involving one of the fundamental precepts upon which the philosophy of Jefferson and of his country rested. It was the same issue, indeed, that had earlier called forth the unforgettable declaration that now stands carved upon one of the three great monuments of our National Capital: "I have sworn upon the altar of God eternal hostility against every form of tyranny over the mind of man." It was the issue to which Jefferson devoted his entire life, invariably upholding the oath he had taken in defense of free inquiry.

"I really am mortified," he declared in his letter to Dufief, "to be told that, in the United States of America, a fact like this can become a subject of inquiry, and of criminal inquiry, too, as an offense against religion; that a question about the sale of a book can be carried before the civil magistrate. Is this, then, our freedom of religion? And are we to have a censor whose imprimatur shall say what books may be sold and what we may buy? And who is thus to dogmatize religious opinions for our citizens? Whose foot is to be the measure to which ours are all to be cut or stretched? Is a priest to be our inquisitor, or shall a layman, simple as ourselves, set up his reason as the rule for what we are to read and what we must believe?

"It is an insult to our citizens to question whether they are rational beings or not, and blasphemy against religion to suppose it cannot stand a test of truth and reason. If M. de Bécourt's book be false in its facts, disprove them; if false in its reasoning, refute it. But, for God's sake, let us freely hear both sides, if we choose. I know little of its contents, having barely glanced over here and there a passage and over the table of contents. From this the Newtonian philosophy seemed the chief object of attack—the issue of which might be trusted to the strength of the two combatants—Newton certainly not needing the auxiliary arm of the government, and still less the holy author of our religion as to what in it concerns him. I thought the work would be very innocent and one which might be confided to the reason of any man; not likely to be much read, if let alone, but, if persecuted, it will be generally read. Every man in the United States will think it a duty to buy a copy, in vindication of his right to buy, and to read what he pleases. * * *

"But," Jefferson concluded, "it is impossible that the laws of Pennsylvania, which set us the first example of the wholesome and happy effects of religious freedom, can permit these inquisitorial functions to be proposed to their courts. Under them you are surely safe."

Impossible? Dufief was safe, for he had a stalwart champion and the generation that had fought for the great cause of American liberties in the Revolution was still on the scene, still determined to admit no failure of the proposition to which they had dedicated their lives and sacred honor. That proposition was grounded upon the belief that man was innately good rather than evil; that he was endowed by nature with certain indefeasible rights; that, if the yoke of tyranny in every form were removed, man's natural reason and humane instincts would lead him to prefer justice to injustice, equality to privilege, independence of mind to servile obedience to authority, rational judgments to superstition, ignorance, and bigotry; and that, finally, in order to achieve this end and to give mankind full freedom to pursue this course and to govern himself in accordance with its high ideals, it was absolutely essential that every man should have free access to knowledge, unopposed by any barriers that might be erected by any authority.

This was not a new ideal or a new faith. It was what Milton called "the good old cause" and its lineage could be traced through many countries and many ages. But old as it was as an ideal, no government in history had adopted it as a philosophy until Jefferson and his compatriots brought forth a union indissolubly linked with the cause of liberty.

This philosophy sustained and informed all of Jefferson's private thinking and public acts. But he was too much a realist not to know that mankind had a peculiar susceptibility to folly, superstition, and the easy and comfortable inclination of yielding obedience to authority. He believed mankind capable of progress, but only if men were free to know their rights and privileges. The people must be free to form their own opinions and to exercise their native reason untrammeled by authority.

Jefferson's devotion to the Union and his belief in the people required courage as well as faith. For the issue of liberty versus authority arbitrarily exercised was one that he was obliged to face in the arena of practical politics. In 1798 the party in power, fearful of the threat of foreign ideas and their subversive tendencies, enacted the Alien and Sedition Acts which made it a criminal offense for "brawlers against Government" to voice opinions considered dangerous or revolutionary.

Jefferson declared these acts to be as palpably unconstitutional in their infringement of the right of free speech as if Congress had ordered the citizens of the United States to bow down and worship a golden calf. More, he brought forth the Virginia-Kentucky resolutions, a weapon that he used reluctantly and with caution, for the doctrine of nullification on which these resolutions rested pointed straight toward disunion. But, he must have reasoned, since liberty and the Union were one cause, of what value was the Union if its powers were used to destroy those liberties guaranteed by the Declaration of Independence and the Bill of Rights?

Fortunately, the ultimate recourse to disunion was not necessary. The verdict of the people whose rights Jefferson was defending was an overwhelming verdict. In 1800 those who had attempted to suppress dissent were dispossessed of their offices and their legislative authority. Aiming their blows directly at Jefferson and his supposedly dangerous following, the Federalists succeeded only in committing political suicide and in elevating their most conspicuous enemy to the chief magistracy. A self-confident Nation, inspired by the steadfast faith of one who had not separated himself by fear or distrust from the bulk of his countrymen, had taken heart from his example.

Jefferson recognized the implications of this verdict in his first inaugural. Many, he knew, had doubted the permanence of the Union and had questioned the ability of the Nation to survive such a political revolution as it had just experienced. "I knew indeed," he declared, "that some honest men have feared that a republican government cannot be strong; that this Government is not strong enough * * * I believe this, on the contrary, the strongest Government on earth." It was strongest, Jefferson meant, in its reliance upon a great ideal lying in the hearts and minds of its people, without which armies and economic power and even constitutions would be valueless.

Nowhere in American annals has this spirit of tolerance of dissent received a more transcendent expression than in these words from Jefferson's great first inaugural: "If there be any among us who wish to dissolve this Union or to change its republican form, let them stand undisturbed as monuments of the safety with which error of opinion may be tolerated where reason is left free to combat it."

II

The discoveries of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries have made it philosophically and historically impossible for us to cling to the absolutes that Jefferson accepted as self-evident. There are no absolutes in the twentieth century—at least we think there are none—and the concept of natural law is no longer accepted as fixed and unchallengeable. Yet, even though we think ourselves justified in discarding as untenable the basic assumption upon which the Jeffersonian philosophy rested, the gravest question that we can ask ourselves is whether we are justified in discarding the system along with its premises. Do we dare discard the rights of man along with the concept of natural law?

* * * * *

Have we consciously and deliberately come to the conclusion that Jefferson's tolerance of subversive ideas and of disloyal dissent can no longer be justified? If so, on what grounds have we reached that conclusion? Are we doing it in the name of liberty if not of natural law? If so, what kind of liberty? Jefferson would scarcely have understood our use of the term "liberty" if in its name we attempt to control the way in which men speak or the thoughts which they express or the intellectual investigations which they undertake. He would have called it tyranny and he would have fought it with every resource at his command.

* * * * *

The seizure of books, some of them used in college instruction, is only one incident in a mounting demand for conformity. The House of Representatives passed by an overwhelming majority a bill which would have made Thomas Jefferson liable to imprisonment and fine if he had voiced the opinion in the first inaugural that I have just quoted—a bill establishing so firmly the dangerous principle of "guilt by association" that it may limit the right to publish books because of the author's politics or because of the political views expressed.

The preamble of this so-called Subversive Activities Control Act declares its justification to be that of protecting American institutions and the Nation itself from infiltration by those who would establish a totalitarian dictatorship. How can we justify so far-reaching a piece of legislation except on the fundamental assumption that the people cannot be trusted to distinguish truth and error?

This bill was sponsored by the House Committee on Un-American Activities. Though it pays lip service to the first amendment, it is comparable only to the Alien and Sedition Acts of 1798, acts which Thomas Jefferson regarded as so subversive, so destructive of everything that the American Union stood for, that he was driven along the pathway toward disunion in his attempt to defeat so gross a violation of individual right.

But this bill and its sponsoring committee are only the larger symptoms of a disease that is epidemic throughout the country. The public press, the great instrument for the protection of our liberties which Jefferson preferred to government itself, has shamefully acquiesced. Not only acquiesced; but, shaken by the fear of a common foe, distrustful of the ability of the people to distinguish between right and wrong, has actually helped to produce the hysteria that would compel uniformity.

Editors have approved tactly or explicitly the withdrawal of textbooks and the expulsion of teachers whose ideas do not conform to the established economic or political views; they have aided in compelling educators, school boards, trustees, and others to yield to the pressures of unofficial groups that object to dissenting opinion in the realm of economics, politics, or religion. They have committed the ultimate disloyalty to their trust by attempting to command loyalty, overlooking the simple fact that loyalty cannot be commanded but can only be deserved. Educators, editors, librarians, even those scholars who hold, or at least have the responsibility of defending, the last citadel of civil rights, have all but capitulated to the wave of fear and distrust that is now sweeping over us. Too many have acted the part of Dufief, putting themselves first; too few the part of Jefferson, defending his country's principles at all costs.

III

Just where will this demand for conformity, for unquestioning loyalty, lead? Thomas Jefferson, for one, was certain that it would not lead to human enlightenment, to progress, or to the fullest expressions of reason, justice, and equity toward which our Nation directed its early course.

"I join you, therefore," he wrote to one of his young protégés after the passage of the Alien and Sedition Acts, "in branding as cowardly the idea that the human mind is incapable of further advances. This is precisely the doctrine that the present despots of the earth are inculcating, and their friends are reechoing; and applying especially to religion and politics; that is not probable anything better will be discovered than what was known to our fathers. We are to look backward then and not forward for the improvement of science, and to find it amidst feudal barbarisms and the fires of Spitalfields. But thank heaven the American mind is already too much opened to listen to these impostures; and while the art of printing is left to us, science can never be retrograde; what is once acquired of real knowledge can never be lost."

But to what advantage, we may ask Jefferson, is the art of printing if what is printed must conform to the established pattern? Of what value is the vaunted public press or our institutions of higher learning, dedicated to the progress of the mind in all fields, when the trustees of the University of Wyoming appoint a committee to examine textbooks for "subversive" material? Of what value is our professed ideal of free education, of the untrammeled pursuit of knowledge, when we acquiesce in the action of the Newark Board of Education which removed certain periodicals from school libraries? What precisely do we mean by liberty as we contemplate the magnates of Hollywood who, in trembling haste, toss sacrifices to a clamoring committee of Congress and beat their breasts in loud protestation of their innocence of a charge that none but the Un-American Activities Committee could bring against them with a straight face—the charge that they employ revolutionists to prepare their mediocre art?

These are only a few specific incidents and they are taken at random. Every day's news adds to the list and the most thoughtful educators are becoming increasingly concerned with this growing threat to a basic concept of American institutions. It is not without significance that large numbers of professors in our institutions of higher learning have signed petition after petition throughout the country, protesting against the proposed act of Congress sponsored by the Committee on Un-American Activities. Their petitions have uniformly condemned both the bill and the activities of the committee itself as being subversive of the ideals for which this country has traditionally stood. I think such testimonials cannot be dismissed as the statements of paid hirelings of a foreign totalitarianism. These men have fought Milton's "good old cause" on too many fronts and they have sacrificed too much in the cause of education to be charged with such a calumny. Nor can they be dismissed as theorists, visionaries, and crackpots, unrealistic in their views and out of touch with the world of affairs: for these are the men—some of them at least—who formed the chief reliance of this Nation in the scientific knowledge which shortened World War II and brought success to American arms.

Responsible heads of the public press who point in commendation to the Committee on Un-American Activities in its shameless pilloring of American citizens and in its flagrant disregard of rights and liberties are either ignorant of the nature and the extent of the protest that is beginning to swell or they value suppression more than they value our freedom or they are deliberately misleading their public. In any event, history has proved time and again that the cause they espouse is a shameful and a futile cause. They lack the vision and the courage that led Jefferson in the infancy of our Nation to defy any threat in the realm of ideas, not by suppression but by tolerance. They have little faith and in its place they offer what Jefferson declared to be an insult to the American citizenry—the insult of saying in effect that Americans cannot be trusted to read or to understand or to discriminate. They fear a foreign ideology, unaware of the fact that here at home the liberty that they profess to cherish is in danger of being done to death in the house of friends and with their aid.

I do not impugn the motives of those legislators, editors, educators, and others who have adopted this mistaken course. I do not doubt their devotion to this Nation. I do not question their loyalty to the high ideals of a free press. But I do affirm that the methods they have supported in this present issue put them on the side of the enemies of the "good old cause" of Milton and Jefferson. Those who have adopted this course of compulsory loyalty, though they might disagree with me on everything else, would I think join me in saying that Thomas Jefferson, more than any other single American, can rightfully be regarded as the great spokesman for our ideals and our liberties.

IV

I think it is undoubtedly true that Jefferson, always a realist and a man of practical statesmanship, would have viewed our problems in the light of our knowledge. Since he was a relativist in a world of absolutes, he would probably be more so in a relativistic world. Though he knew history as few in his generation did, he looked to it for perspective, not for dogmatic authority. He would very likely have regarded it as cowardly of us to look to him as our sole guidance. The earth, he declared, belongs to the living. "Can one generation bind another and all others in succession forever?" he asked. "I think not. The Creator has made the earth for the living not the dead. * * * A generation may bind itself as long as its majority continues in life; when that has disappeared, another majority is in place, holds all the rights and powers their predecessors once held and may change their laws and institutions to suit themselves. Nothing then is unchangeable but the inherent and inalienable rights of man."

But he also declared that justice is the fundamental law of society and that "the majority, oppressing an individual, is guilty of a crime, abuses its strength, and by acting on the law of the strongest breaks up the foundations of society."

It may be that today, because we have achieved such an excess of power and knowledge beyond our ability to manage, we cannot afford the tolerance and the free flow and interchange and clash of ideas that he advocated. I do not think so. At least, if this is so, the alternative evil to which we must turn in our dilemma is worse than the evil from which we fly, simply because of the vast power now in our hands. But even if this were true, let us be honest. Let us not exercise this power of the majority to suppress the rights of individuals and call it the honored name by which our liberties have come down to us. Let us not call it a free republic whose principles we deny while we commit acts that desecrate its name. Let us frankly, solemnly, and with a full realization of what we are doing and what consequences we may draw from our actions, admit that we no longer believe in the ideals that made us great.

I for one do not fear the outcome. The verdict in the twentieth century will, I believe, be what it was in 1800 and what it was in the Age of the Reformation. I believe with Jefferson that "in every country where man is free to think and speak, differences of opinion will arise from differences of perception, and the imperfection of reason; that these differences when permitted, as in this happy country, to purify themselves by free discussion, are but as passing clouds overspreading our land transiently and leaving our horizon more bright and serene."

But I believe also that we cannot wait complacently on the calm assumption that this will come about through acquiescence or through temporary yielding to pressures of authority or through letting the storm spend itself. It will come about only when, as Jefferson said, "to preserve the freedom of the human mind and freedom of the press every spirit should be ready to devote itself to martyrdom; for as long as we may think as we will and speak as we think, the condition of man will proceed in improvement."

The alternative that he implied was obvious: deny this freedom, acquiesce in this abridgment of our liberties—and the promise of improvement of the human race would diminish or cease. If, then, the power that we have achieved in the twentieth century, which is nothing less than the power of planetary destruction, is so great as to deny us the rights that have been achieved over the centuries, let us frankly acknowledge that the price of this denial is the loss of our promise of moral and intellectual improvement. It is a price so fearfully exacting as to make man's future one of mere existence and not of destiny. It is a price that mankind has steadfastly refused to pay.

The President's Midyear Budget Review—The United States Will Incur an Operating Deficit in a Period of Peak National Income

OF

HON. HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mrs. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following extract from the President's midyear budget review:

STATEMENT BY THE PRESIDENT REVIEWING THE 1949 BUDGET

INTRODUCTION

I am issuing today my regular midyear review of the budget of the United States. The Federal budget expresses in dollar terms the policies and programs of our Government. This review sets forth the changes which have taken place in the budget for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1949, since it was originally transmitted to the Congress last January. This review, therefore, gives the American people a factual report on the revised costs of these policies and programs and a reappraisal of our fiscal position. It reflects the effect upon the budget of subsequent amendments which I have proposed, of actions taken by the Congress, and of changes in conditions both at home and abroad.

The outstanding facts shown by this review are as follows:

1. Budget expenditures for the fiscal year 1949 are now estimated at $42,200,000,000—substantially higher than was estimated in January—largely because of increases in the national-defense program, increased benefits for veterans, and increased tax refunds.

2. The tax reduction enacted in April will cause receipts for the fiscal year 1949 to be substantially lower than was estimated in January. Budget receipts are now estimated at $40,700,000,000.

3. As a result, an operating deficit of $1,500,000,000 is now anticipated for 1949, compared with the record surplus of $8,400,000,000 in 1948. This sharp reversal eliminates one of the principal forces that have been restraining further inflation.

4. The public debt was reduced by $6,000,000,000 in 1948. Present estimates indicate that no further reduction in the total debt will be possible in 1949.

5. As we look ahead it is clear that our national and international responsibilities make impossible any sharp reduction in Government expenditures in 1950—indeed it is likely that there will be some increase. It is plain, therefore, that the ill-timed tax reduction of last spring has left the Government facing a period of deficit financing.

PART I. SUMMARY

Budget receipts for the fiscal year 1949 are now estimated at $40,700,000,000—$3,700,000,000 less than was estimated last January. This lower estimate of receipts reflects the impact of the Revenue Act of 1948. It assumes a continuation throughout the fiscal year of approximately the present level of incomes.

Budget expenditures are estimated at $42,200,000,000—an increase of $2,600,000,000 above the estimate made in January.

On the basis of these estimates, an operating deficit of $1,500,000,000 for the fiscal year 1949 is indicated. However, the Economic Cooperation Act required the transfer of $3,000,000,000 of the 1948 surplus to pay part of the 1949 expenditures under that act. This results in an adjusted surplus of $1,500,000,000 for 1949.

[1] Budget receipts and expenditures in this review exclude payments into the Treasury by wholly owned Government corporations for retirement of capital stock or for dividends. Such transactions, previously included in budget totals, simply inflate both receipts and expenditures by equal amounts. They do not represent operating costs, nor do they affect the size of the budget surplus or deficit. The transactions eliminated in this review are shown in table 9.

During the past 3 years I have repeatedly taken action to enforce sound and prudent management of our fiscal affairs, in order to curb inflationary pressures, to safeguard our financial position, and to permit reduction of the public debt.

Nevertheless, as we enter the fiscal year 1949 we can foresee only a paper surplus of $1,500,000,000. This should be a sobering thought for all of us. Such a surplus—even if it were real, rather than produced merely by a bookkeeping shift from one year to another—would provide a financial margin far too small, in view of present-day uncertainties and the necessity of reducing the debt during periods of prosperity.

In the message accompanying the 1949 budget I stated that the budget "demonstrates alike the heavy responsibilities of our international position and our concern for the maintenance of a sound domestic economy." I also pointed out that "our budget must remain high until we have met our international responsibilities and can see the way clear to a peaceful and prosperous world."

Events of the past 6 months have added emphasis to these facts. We have been compelled to reexamine our requirements for national defense. At the same time, the Federal Government, like the private citizen, has had to meet rising prices. In an effort to keep benefits, services, and salaries in step with the mounting cost of living, the Congress has enacted increases in veterans' pensions, other veterans' benefits, grants to States for public assistance, Federal salary scales, and other programs.

Events of the last 6 months have also emphasized that we cannot plan our fiscal policy on the basis of a single year only. Programs already authorized for the National Military Establishment will require a higher level of expenditures for the fiscal year 1950. Expenditures for the European recovery program will reach their peak in the same year. These increases cannot be met next year by the convenient bookkeeping device of a $3,000,000,000 transfer.

During the fiscal year 1948, the debt was reduced from $258,000,000,000 to $252,000,000,000. On the basis of present estimates no further debt reduction can be achieved this year. Indeed, as long as the present fiscal outlook prevails, we may face an expanding debt—even in a period of high national income when financial prudence clearly would dictate continuing debt retirement.

It is possible that further inflationary developments may produce higher revenues than those now estimated—revenues might even rise above expenditures. Even if this should prove true, however, it is hardly sound fiscal policy to rely on inflation as a method of balancing the budget.

To cut Government revenues in the face of expanding national and international requirements, and at a time of increasing inflationary pressures, was obviously a grave error.

Appropriations and other authorizations

In this review prospective Government outgo has so far been expressed in terms of estimated expenditures. It is also necessary to consider the appropriations and other authorizations enacted by the Congress, which permit Government agencies to incur obligations. Expenditures occur when obligations are paid; they do not necessarily coincide with congressional authorizations in any given fiscal year.

The Eightieth Congress in its second session reduced annual definite appropriations, relating to both the fiscal years 1948 and 1949, by $2,700,000,000 below the amount which I submitted. For several reasons, however, this figure does not realistically reflect the results of congressional actions. It relates to only one segment of the budgetary actions of the session. It ignores types of authorizations other than appropriations, such as loan and contract authorizations, which the Congress increased more than $1,000,000,000 over my recommendations. It does not allow, of course, for the supplemental appropriations for 1949 which will be required before the close of the year.

A better perspective may be obtained from the following:

I submitted for the fiscal year 1949 specific requests for appropriations and other forms of authorization totaling $36,300,000,000. Congressional enactments to date, together with permanent appropriations, amount to $34,600,000,000, or $1,700,000,00 less than requested. These congressional reductions in authorizations will have to be restored for some items, such as veterans' allowances and postal expenditures. Furthermore, it will be necessary to provide appropriations to carry out several laws enacted by the Congress for which it made no financial provision—such as the increases in Federal employees' salaries and veterans' pensions. Finally, a number of programs, such as international aid, will require additional appropriations. In all, it is now estimated that it will be necessary later this year to request $3,600,000,000 as supplemental appropriations.

PART II. MAJOR CHANGES IN EXPENDITURES BY FUNCTION

Expenditures for the fiscal year 1949 are now expected to be $2,600,000,000 higher than they were in the January budget.

NOTE.—Detailed figures do not necessarily add to totals due to rounding.

Major changes in expenditure estimates since January include:

An enlarged national defense program, including expanded air strength and increases in military personnel, with added expenditures in 1949 of $1,100,000,000. This takes into account a reduction of $400,000,000 resulting from failure to enact a universal training program.

Higher readjustment benefits and pensions for veterans, which will increase expenditures for veterans' programs by $689,000,000.

Increase tax refunds amounting to $799,000,000, resulting chiefly from the new tax law.

Larger mortgage purchases, which will increase expenditures for housing and community facilities by $289,000,000.

There have also been some major reduction in the 1949 budget since it was transmitted last January. In large measure, these result from the failure of the Congress to enact legislation which I have recommended, such as Federal aid to education, and for which estimates of expenditures were included in the January budget.

The estimates of expenditures which follow are based not only on appropriations and authorizations already enacted, but also upon anticipated supplementals which it will be necessary to submit to the next session of the Congress.

Flood Control a Sensible Investment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement on the flood-control problems of Pennsylvania:

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS, OF PENNSYLVANIA, ON THE FLOOD-CONTROL PROBLEMS OF PENNSYLVANIA

Of all the basic reforms and innovations of the Democratic national administrations of the past 16 years, none has been more popular and more necessary in Pennsylvania than the launching of the coordinated flood-control program authorized in the Flood Control Act of 1936.

Enactment of this legislation followed some of the most severe floods Pittsburgh and other areas of the State had ever suffered. Losses in damages and in lives were so horrible that proposals for effective national planning and construction to prevent floods found ready acceptance.

The 1936 act recognized that floods are no respecter of State lines. It recognized that an effective method of curbing floods in northern Pennsylvania is to prevent them at the source in lower New York State; that the best way to protect Pittsburgh lay in heading off the floods of the Monongahela, Allegheny, and Ohio far up at their headwaters, in upper and lower Pennsylvania, in West Virginia, in Ohio. A Democratic administration and Democratic Congresses put this knowledge to work in the form of adequate appropriations to launch this tremendous flood-control program in Pennsylvania and elsewhere.

The war interrupted this work, since the materials and manpower which would have gone into flood control were needed urgently and immediately in the all-out war effort. Although this curtailment in work meant a delay of perhaps a half dozen years in many of the extremely important projects in Pennsylvania, the people of Pennsylvania recognized the necessity for the abrupt halt in flood control and, although some of our communities suffered grievous damage in wartime floods, they waited patiently for the years of peace which would signal a renewal of their life-saving and property-protecting flood-control works.

Williamsport was inundated by a major flood just a few years ago which would have been prevented had work begun there before the war been completed. Instead, the people of Williamsport sadly watched the swirling waters sweep around their uncompleted dikes and rush into the very heart of the city.

Pittsburgh, on the other hand, was more fortunate. And so was Johnstown. Work on giant reservoirs to protect Pittsburgh were virtually completed before the war and a channel and dike project at Johnstown was also in operation when the curtain was lowered on further construction during the war.

Both communities were to be grateful numerous times in the succeding years for their effective protection, protection which was not yet quite complete but which saved hundreds of millions of dollars in damages and untold lives.

Shortly after the war ended, the Democratic Seventy-ninth Congress immediately started legislation on its way to enactment to provide funds for the resumption of flood-control work. A Pennsylvania Democrat, the late Representative J. Buell Snyder, was chairman of the House Appropriations Subcommittee on Civil Functions of the War Department, and was also a member of the Deficiency Subcommittee and in those capacities assured the inclusion of adequate flood-control funds in the first postwar appropriations bills.

However, in view of the tremendous demand for immediate action on numerous projects both halted and postponed during the war, the House Appropriations Committee, after recommending initial postwar funds for several score of those which had already been under way, attempted to limit funds only to those projects and to hold down the start of new projects for a year or so.

Under these circumstances, it remained for my former Democratic colleague, Senator Guffey, and me to persuade the Senate to write into these initial postwar measures both the huge Conemaugh Reservoir designed nearly to double the flood protection which Pittsburgh was receiving from a half-dozen other reservoirs, and also the East Branch Clarion Reservoir protecting Johnsonburg, Ridgway, St. Marys, and other communities in Elk County. Both had been left out of the first postwar House appropriation bills but were agreed to by House conferees after they had been written into the appropriation measures by the Senate.

Since that time expenditures for flood control have been increasing rapidly each year, because more and more new projects are being put into the going stage. There was great opposition to this in the Eightieth Congress, but the Congress was finally persuaded that flood control is one of the most sensible investments our Government could make.

However, in both sessions of the Eightieth Congress, the House of Representatives, attempting to make wholesale slashes in Government expenditures, sought to reduce considerably the amounts made available to continue an integrated flood-control program. Had the appropriation bills passed by the House been enacted into law in that form, numerous vital projects in Pennsylvania would have been drastically affected. Those include:

WILLIAMSPORT, PA., FLOOD WALLS

I have already described what happened in Williamsport as a result of the wartime curtailment of flood work there—how a disastrous flood in May of 1946 swept around the partially completed flood walls of the community and caused a flood almost as tragic as the terrible flood of 1936. Until those dikes are completed Williamsport will remain in a state of terror from every heavy rainfall.

Yet in 1947, when the administration requested $2,436,000 for continuation of work at Williamsport, the Republican House cut this amount down to $1,836,000 as part of a so-called economy drive. Fortunately, the Senate Appropriations Committee granted my plea for a restoration of the full amount and the project proceeded at reasonable speed.

This year, however, the House again cut the budget for Williamsport by almost the same amount—from $2,244,400 to $1,900,000, or a difference of $344,400—about 15 percent. Although the Senate Appropriations Committee and the Senate agreed with me that the full budget amount should be provided, and so wrote the bill, the House Appropriations Committee leadership refused to accept the increase in conference and the final appropriation is identical with the original House figure. This short-sighted penny-pinching will force a delay in previous plans to have these dikes far enough along by mid-1950 to provide some real protection. Furthermore, it will probably prevent the previously scheduled start of construction in this fiscal year on the Hagermans Run pressure conduit and the South Williamsport railroad alterations.

I cannot understand the reasoning which the House used in cutting this meritorious project and the House committee itself made no effort to explain it.

PUNXSUTAWNEY FLOOD DIKES

This $3,030,000 project to protect Punxsutawney against a repetition of damaging floods of past years is on its way to completion by about July 1, 1949, thanks largely to the good sense of the Senate in restoring cuts made by the House.

After the Seventy-ninth Congress had speeded the work along and the Eightieth Congress in the first session maintained a good pace on it, the engineers came before Congress this year to ask for $1,428,100 to complete it in this fiscal year ending next July 1. For reasons never made clear, the House Appropriations Committee and the House, again practicing what was termed Republican economy, cut the request by nearly 23 percent, or to $1,100,000. This cut would have forced the work to continue into the next fiscal year and delay its completion accordingly. However, the Senate heeded my request for restoration of the cut and the full amount was subsequently written into the final bill. This project, when completed, will prevent such floods as that in 1936 which caused about $1,047,000 in damages, and will remove the worry of floods from 4,000 residents and many industrial concerns. The estimated damage this project will prevent annually will more than make up in 3 years' time the entire amount which the House had tried to cut out of the appropriation this year.

EAST BRANCH CLARION RIVER RESERVOIR

As I stated earlier, this project was gotten under way because of the insistence of the Senate, at the request of Senator Guffey and myself, that it be included among early postwar projects. Once we succeeded in the Seventy-ninth Congress in getting an initial $500,000 appropriation for it however, Eightieth Congress economy almost intervened disastrously. The House in 1947 gave some study to the project but failed to include any money in the appropriation bill. However, when I appealed to the Senate Appropriations Committee, it wrote in a $1,000,000 sum, which was included in the final bill that year, making a total of $1,500,000 available for a good start on the work.

This year, when the engineers asked for an additional $2,000,000, the House cut the amount by 15 percent, or $300,000. Although I persuaded the Senate to restore this cut, the House refused flatly to agree to the higher figure. Thus, our goal of having this project brought to 43 percent of completion by June 30, 1949, and completed by mid-1951 is denied unless succeeding Congresses approach this matter more realistically than the Republican-controlled House in this Eightieth Congress has done. The damage this project will prevent each year once it is completed will be substantially greater than the amortized annual cost of the project. As I have said many times, I think that kind of Government expenditure extremely sensible and good business.

SUNBURY DIKES

Sunbury, like Williamsport, suffered a serious flood in May 1946, which would have been prevented had a diking system now under construction there been completed. These walls are now being speeded to completion. However, last year, after the administration asked for $1,369,000 to continue the work, the House allowed only $1,169,000. This $300,000 cut would have represented a serious delay in progress, and so the Senate, at my request, restored the money to the bill and we got it through in final form. This year the full budget amount was granted, and Sunbury can now look forward to early achievement of flood protection.

OTHER PROJECTS

Work is rushing along toward completion of the Loyalhanna and Youghiogheny Reservoirs in the network protecting Pittsburgh and the Ohio River Valley. Both reservoirs have been in operation for some years, and modest appropriations this year will allow for the finishing touches. The huge Conemaugh Dam is proceeding on schedule, and will be a vast bulwark to the whole Ohio Valley, and particularly to Pittsburgh. Some remaining work on the Codorus Creek project at York will soon be completed. An adequate appropriation was obtained for the channel improvement work at Latrobe costing $146,000, and effective strengthening of Johnstown's flood protection will be completed this year also through an appropriation of $402,000, which will make this town, in truth, the floodless city.

NEW PROJECTS

There has been altogether too much reluctance on the part of the Eightieth Congress, in its economy drive, to give proper consideration to the need for an orderly program of initiating new projects so that the backlog does not become desperately and hopelessly large. The House, both last year and this year, in line with this false economy, drastically trimmed administration requests for planning funds. Last year the Senate succeeded in reversing the House cut of 50 percent on planning and wrote in the full amount necessary to allow for a reasonable degree of advance planning on such projects as the Bear Creek Reservoir to protect Allentown and Bethlehem and the Lehigh Valley, the Turtle Creek Reservoir in the western Pennsylvania network, Tyrone, and the Lackawaxen River Basin.

Unfortunately, however, the House again this year cut planning funds, this time by 25 percent, and the Senate was unable to obtain full restoration in the conference bill. As I pointed out at the time the bill was before the Senate, the House cuts mean substantial reductions in work on the Shenango and Turtle Creek Reservoirs and at Tyrone. By careful allotment of its allowance for planning, the engineers inform me that they can reach almost the original schedule of progress on the Johnsonburg-Wilcox project and perhaps on Prompton Reservoir, although the planning allotment for the entire Lackawaxen system cannot be up to budget levels. The Johnsonburg-Wilcox allotment of $7,000 is so modest that the engineers were not forced to cut it despite the House cut, but other projects of a larger nature will, of necessity, suffer from the 25-percent decrease. No work will be done on the Dyberry Creek Reservoir in the Lackawaxen system.

LACKAWAXEN RIVER

I am pleased that the Senate Public Works Committee reversed the action of the House Public Works Committee and agreed with my request to write original enabling legislation for the Lackawaxen program into the omnibus flood-control authorization bill. Next year, however, this authorization must be broadened to include the Dyberry Creek Reservoir, which I could not persuade the committee to approve this year. My bill, S. 1908, provided for necessary authorization for both the Prompton and Dyberry Creek Reservoirs. The reason which the committee gave in separating this dual project into two parts and authorizing only the Prompton Reservoir was economy. I see no economy in delaying a mere authorization, which carries no funds with it. The action of the Eightieth Congress in approving only the one reservoir merely drags out and delays an inevitable step and is most unfair to the residents of Honesdale, Hawley, and vicinity who are menaced by the floods these two reservoirs on the Lackawaxen will curb.

BRADFORD, PA., FLOOD WORKS

Some years ago I introduced the original legislation providing for a survey of flood conditions in and near Bradford, Pa., to determine the need for a Federal project. Before this survey was completed, a new flood struck the area and a resurvey was made necessary in order to assure the compilation of the most complete data. The Army engineer survey demonstrated the need for a flood-control project, and I then introduced S. 2814 to authorize it.

Unfortunately, the House Public Works Committee would not consider the Bradford project because the final report on it from the War Department had not been transmitted to Congress. However, I did persuade the Senate Public Works Committee to consider my bill and to question Army engineer experts on its merits. The engineer representatives presented full and complete facts based on their survey to demonstrate the need and the economic justification for this work.

The project outlined in my bill was not included in the omnibus flood-control bill reported out late in the regular session by the Senate Public Works Committee. I was informed that it was not included because the committee had adopted a flat policy of including no projects which had not yet cleared the Bureau of the Budget. Therefore, even though the subcommittee of the Public Works Committee which had drafted the omnibus bill had approved S. 2814 for inclusion in it, the full committee reversed this position and left this project out entirely. Several others in similar status were also left out.

I opposed this policy and pointed out that the Senate committee had full authority and ample precedent for including any project it deemed worthy, regardless of whether that project had actually cleared the Budget Bureau reviewing staff. The Congress, it seems to me, has no hesitancy about disregarding the Budget Bureau whenever it really wants to do so, but insists on hiding behind the Budget Bureau when it suits its purpose. The refusal to include the Bradford project in the omnibus bill means that it will be about midyear of next year at the earliest before, under normal circumstances, legislation to authorize this project can be enacted. Then it will probably be too late to obtain any funds for it in the next appropriation bill.

It will be my purpose to attempt to get action on the Bradford project as soon as possible after the Eighty-first Congress convenes. I shall reintroduce S. 2814 in the new Congress and press for action by the Senate committee. Members of this committee have assured me, at least, that they will not wait until the very end of the Eighty-first Congress—in 1950—to act on an omnibus flood-control bill, but will start one through Congress in the first session.

CONCLUSION

In Pennsylvania we have learned that flood-control expenditures are among our most sensible and effective investments. Pennsylvania historically has been ravaged by great floods. We have seen in the last 12 years, since the enactment of the historic Flood Control Act of 1936, that these floods can be prevented and lives and property saved from their disastrous effects.

The lesson we have learned in our State is not yet learned as well as it should be by many Members of Congress who fail to recognize the investment features of flood control and see only the dollar sign before the appropriation figure. Penny pinching on flood control is not economy; it is absurdity.

As I have done throughout my career in Congress, I will continue my efforts to assure adequate funds for flood-control needs. Flood control is a national problem and must be attacked in an integrated national program. Pennsylvania has been accorded by the Democratic administrations of the past 16 years the treatment deserving of a State which contributes a huge share of Federal revenues and which is the keystone of our industrial and defense potential. Attempts of the Republican-controlled Eightieth Congress to cut flood-control work in Pennsylvania and elsewhere are deplored by all thinking Pennsylvanians.

Foreign Trade Authority Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BERTRAND W. GEARHART

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Speaker, I feel that Senate bill 2582, introduced in the Eightieth Congress by Senator GEORGE W. MALONE, of Nevada, is of such great importance in our foreign-trade policies that I wish to have it printed in order that this legislation might be given earnest study by Members of the Congress with a view to enactment during the Eighty-first Congress.

I hand to the Public Printer for inclusion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a copy of Senate bill 2582, together with a summary and explanation of the bill.

S. 2582

[In the Senate of the United States, April 28 (legislative day, April 22), 1948, Mr. MALONE (for himself and Mr. BUTLER) introduced the following bill; which was read twice and referred to the Committee on Finance]

A bill to amend the Tariff Act of 1930, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc.—

DECLARATION OF POLICY

SECTION 1. It is declared to be the policy of the Congress—

(a) to facilitate and encourage the importation into the United States of foreign goods and products in quantities sufficient to supplement the needs of the various branches of American industry and agriculture;

(b) to foster and provide for the export of the products of American industry and agriculture in quantities sufficient to pay for the needed imports;

(c) to develop and promote a well-balanced, integrated, and diversified production within the United States so as to maintain a sound national economy and a high level of employment in industry and agriculture;

(d) to provide necessary flexibility of import duties thereby making possible appropriate adjustments in response to changing economic conditions;

(e) to assure the accomplishment of these objectives by returning to the United States the control over American import duties now subject to international agreements.

RESTATEMENT OF EXISTING IMPORT DUTIES

SEC. 2. Title I, paragraph 1 to 1559, inclusive, of the Tariff Act of 1930 are hereby amended by repealing the classifications and rates therein contained and substituting therefor the classifications and rates obtaining and in effect on June 12, 1948, by reason of proclamations of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930 or otherwise.

FORMATION OF FOREIGN TRADE AUTHORITY

SEC. 3. Title III, part II, section 330 of the Tariff Act of 1930 is hereby amended to read as follows:

The original directors of the Authority shall be the same persons now serving as Commissioners of the United States Tariff Commission, each such person to serve as a director of the Authority until the date when his term of office as a Commissioner of the United States Tariff Commission would have expired. Thereafter the term of office of any successor to any such director shall expire 6 years from the date of the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was appointed except that a director appointed to fill a vacancy occurring for any reason other than the expiration of a term as herein provided shall be appointed only for the remainder of the term which his predecessor would otherwise have served. Directors shall be eligible for appointment to succeed themselves if otherwise qualified therefor. No person shall be eligible for appointment as a director unless he is a citizen of the United States, and, in the judgment of the President, is possessed of qualifications requisite for developing expert knowledge of tariff problems and efficiency in administering the provisions of this act. Not more than three of the directors shall be members of the same political party, and in making appointments members of different political parties shall be appointed alternately as nearly as may be practicable.

"(b) Chairman, Vice Chairman, and Salary: The President shall annually designate one of the directors as Chairman and one as Vice Chairman of the Authority. The Vice Chairman shall act as Chairman in case of absence or disability of the Chairman. SEC. 5. Title III, part II, of the Tariff Act of 1930 is amended by adding at the end of section 331 the following new section:

"SEC. 331A. Administration of Trade Agreements.

"(a) All powers vested in, delegated to, or otherwise properly exercisable by the President or any other officer or agency of the United States in respect to the foreign trade agreements entered into pursuant to section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930 are hereby transferred to, and shall be exercisable by, the Authority, including, but not limited to, the right to invoke the various escape clauses, reservations, and options therein contained, and to exercise on behalf of the United States any rights or privileges therein provided for the protection of the interests of the United States.

"(b) The Authority is hereby authorized and directed—

"(1) to terminate as of the next earliest date therein provided, and in accordance with the terms thereof, all the foreign trade agreements entered into by the United States pursuant to section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930;

"(2) to prescribe, upon termination of any foreign trade agreement, that the import duties established therein shall remain the same as existed prior to such termination, and such import duties shall not thereafter be increased or reduced except in accordance with the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended by this act."

PERIODIC ADJUSTMENT OF IMPORT DUTIES

SEC. 6. Title III, part II, section 336, of the Tariff Act of 1930 is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 336. Periodic Adjustment of Import Duties.

"(a) The Authority is authorized and directed, from time to time, and subject to the limitations hereinafter provided, to prescribe and establish import duties which will, within equitable limits, provide for fair and reasonable competition between domestic articles and like or similar foreign articles. A foreign article shall be considered as providing fair and reasonable competition to producers of a like or similar article if the Authority finds as a fact that the landed duty paid price of the foreign article is a fair price and is not substantially below the price, including a reasonable profit, at which like or similar articles can be offered to consumers of the same class by a domestic producer: Provided, however, That no such import duties shall be established contrary to the provisions of any foreign-trade agreement in effect pursuant to section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930.

"(b) In determining whether the landed duty paid price of a foreign article is, and may continue to be, a fair price under subdivision (a) of this section, the Authority shall take into consideration, insofar as it finds it practicable—

"(1) The lowest landed duty paid price of the article from any foreign country offering substantial competition;

"(2) Any change that may occur or may reasonably be expected in the exchange rate of any country either by reason of devaluation or because of a serious unbalance of international payments;

"(c) Decreases or increases in import duties designed to provide for fair and reasonable competition between foreign and domestic articles may be made by the Authority either upon its own motion or upon application of any person or group showing adequate and proper interest in the import duties in question: Provided, however, That no change in any import duty shall be ordered by the Authority until after it shall have first conducted a full investigation and presented tentative proposals followed by a public hearing at which interested parties have an opportunity to be heard.

"(d) The Authority, in setting import duties so as to establish fair and reasonable competition as herein provided, may, in order to effectuate the purposes of this act, prescribe specific duties or ad valorem rates of duty upon the foreign value or export value as defined in sections 402 (c) and 402 (d) of the Tariff Act of 1930 or upon the United States value as defined in section 402 (e) of said act.

"(e) In order to carry out the purposes of this act, the Authority is authorized to transfer any article from the dutiable list to the free list, or from the free list to the dutiable list.

"(f) Any increase or decrease in import duties ordered by the Authority shall become effective 90 days after such order is announced: Provided, That any such order is first submitted to Congress by the Authority and is not disapproved, in whole or in part, by concurrent resolution of Congress within 60 days thereafter.

"(g) No order shall be announced by the Authority under this section which increases existing import duties on foreign articles if the Authority finds as a fact that the domestic industry operates, or the domestic article is produced, in a wasteful, inefficient, or extravagant manner.

"(h) The Authority, in the manner provided for in subdivisions (c) and (f) in this section, may impose quantitative limits on the importation of any foreign article, in such amounts, and for such periods, as it finds necessary in order to effectuate the purposes of this act: Provided, however, That no such quantitative limit shall be imposed contrary to the provisions of any foreign trade agreement in effect pursuant to section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930.

"(i) For the purpose of this section—

"(1) the term 'domestic article' means an article wholly or in part the growth or product of the United States; and the term 'foreign article' means an article wholly or in part the growth or product of a foreign country;

"(2) the term 'United States' includes the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia;

"(3) the term 'foreign country' means any empire, country, dominion, colony, or protectorate, or any subdivision or subdivisions thereof (other than the United States and its possessions);

"(4) The term 'landed duty paid price' means the price of any foreign article after payment of the applicable customs or import duties and other necessary charges, as represented by the acquisition cost to an importing consumer, dealer, retailer, or manufacturer, or the offering price to a consumer, dealer, retailer, or manufacturer, if imported by an agent.

"(j) The Authority is authorized to make all needful rules and regulations for carrying out its functions under the provisions of this section.

"(k) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to make such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary for the entry and declaration of foreign articles with respect to which a change in basis of value has been made under the provisions of subdivision (d) of this section, and for the form of invoice required at time of entry."

SEC. 12. This act shall take effect as of June 13, 1948.

SUMMARY OF BILL S. 2582

S. 2582, a bill to revise the Tariff Act of 1930, may be described as follows:

Section 1 states the purposes of the amendment. They are:

(a) To facilitate importations to supplement the needs of industry and agriculture.

(b) To foster the export of products sufficient to pay for needed imports.

(c) To develop within the United States a balanced, integrated, and diversified production so as to maintain a sound economy and high level of employment.

(d) To provide flexibility of import duties, thereby making possible adjustments in response to changing economic conditions, and

(e) To return to the United States the control over import duties now subject to international agreements in order to accomplish the above purposes.

Section 2 provides for writing into the Tariff Act all import duties now actually in effect by reason of trade agreements or otherwise (see also sec. 5 relating to existing trade agreements).

Section 3 and section 4 reconstitute the United States Tariff Commission as the new Foreign Trade Authority with additional powers and responsibfilities as set out in section 5 and section 6 below.

Section 5 vests in the Foreign Trade Authority power and responsibility to administer trade agreements already in effect, or which might come into effect prior to June 13, 1948. It also directs the Authority to cancel (as of the earliest date possible) all existing agreements without, however, making changes in the import duties established by those agreements.

Section 6 delegates to the Authority the responsibility for administering a system of flexible import duties and the right to prescribe changes in import duties to provide fair and reasonable competition between domestic articles and like or similar foreign articles. Factors bearing upon the reasonableness of competition are set forth.

In prescribing such changes in import duties, the Authority is not limited as to the percentage of change and is permitted to add articles to or remove articles from the free list, and to establish specific duties or ad valorem duties based either upon foreign value or upon United States value.

Changes in import duties can be made only—

1. After investigation, issuance of tentative proposals and public hearings thereon.

2. Effective in not less than 90 days after promulgation and only if not disapproved by concurrent resolution of Congress within 60 days.

Subject to the same limitations, the Authority is delegated power to impose quantitative restrictions on imports when necessary to effectuate the purposes of the act.

Section 7 contains technical amendments concerning unfair practices in import trade occasioned by the transfer to the Authority of obligations hitherto residing in the President in reference to action in the event of such unfair practices.

Section 8 provides for transfer of personnel, property, funds, etc., from the United States Tariff Commission to the new Foreign Trade Authority and continues proceedings now before the Commission without abatement.

Section 9 repeals part of the act of June 25, 1938, which made section 516 (b) of the Tariff Act of 1930 inoperative as respects any article subject to a trade agreement. The effect of this repeal is to again permit action if it is believed an article is incorrectly classified. This relates to classification rather than to the adequacy of the import duty assessed.

Section 10 gives the chairman of the Foreign Trade Authority the power to request necessary statistical reports, after consultation with the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of Commerce.

Section 11 directs the Authority to prepare a complete text of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended.

Section 12 prescribes the effective date as June 13, 1948, the day after the expiration of the so-called trade-agreements amendment (sec. 350).

The Special Session of Congress

OF
HON. GEORGE H. BENDER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, when President Truman called Congress back into special session, he chose the Democratic National Convention as the place to issue the call. He could not have selected a more appropriate forum. The session was a political maneuver, and everyone in Washington knew it. In fact, Senator BARKLEY, who is now running for Vice President on the Democratic ticket, opposed any session of Congress after the political conventions. He said that such a meeting would be devoted to "political bickering, political legislation, and political oratory."

Our President suggested a 15-day time limit for this special session. He delivered a message reciting 15 important legislative proposals. Let us remember that the Democratic Party was in complete control of Congress and the White House from 1933 to 1947. Mr. Truman challenged Congress to accomplish in 15 days what the Democratic Party had failed to do in 15 years.

Now of course our President did not believe this would be done. He is a realistic politician, and he is playing what some people mistakenly believe to be smart politics. I believe that he has made a colossal blunder which the citizens of our country resent deeply.

No President has the right to play games with the welfare of our Nation. Mr. Truman knew from the word "go" that his party would not support his own program. I had the honor of introducing the anti-poll-tax bill in the Eightieth Congress. The House passed it overwhelmingly. The President knew that this bill was certain to be filibustered to death by his own party, but he made it part of his civil-rights message.

The President knew that everyone is deeply concerned over the constant rise in prices. But when he asked Congress for selective price controls, he was simultaneously asking for increases in minimum wages and in Federal salaries. He did not suggest any means by which we can keep high wages, high farm prices, and cut the cost of living. Nobody else has figured out an answer to that one, either.

It is clear that the whole program presented by the White House smacks of demagoguery. The President would like to enjoy the luxury of irresponsibility. He knows that our difficulties cannot be solved by the magic wand of a few laws. This is the Democratic strategy of the coming election campaign. They will try hard to claim that Congress is to blame for everything that disturbs us.

To quote a famous American, "Let's look at the record." The record shows that Mr. Truman himself abolished price controls on November 9, 1946. It shows that Mr. Truman himself called rationing and price controls "the methods of a police state." It shows that these methods were failures and frauds.

It was difficult enough to check black-market practices in wartime. We can imagine what would happen if we gave Mr. Truman another OPA in time of peace. Let us understand the true causes of inflation. We must not blame one party or another for an economic fact. We have high prices today because of the accumulated demand for goods. We could not manufacture thousands of products during the war, and they are in tremendous demand now. Our Government has been stimulating exports throughout the world to meet overseas needs. We do not propose to stop any of these activities, and I do not believe we should. But there are many things the President has not told us. He still has great powers. The President today has the right through the Treasury and the Federal Reserve Banking System to limit bank credit. He can cut the amount of Government spending in many parts of our Federal set-up. He can direct the policies of the Department of Agriculture. You have probably not heard this. Last month, the month of our special session, the Department of Agriculture was trying to reduce the number of breeding cattle by one-half million in the face of our meat shortage. This is just part of the Government program which keeps the price of farm products up while it tries to drive consumer costs down. It is part of the inconsistency which makes the Democratic Party today a complete patchwork of conflicting, irreconcilable, feuding elements and destroys its claim to public confidence.

There is criticism of the special session for its housing bill. The President has signed it although he says that he does not like it. I agree that there is much still remaining to be done on this important problem. But let there be no mistake about this. Legislation alone will not build houses. In the last week, the President's Midyear Economic Report told us that more than a million new residential units will be completed in 1948. Only a few years ago, the Truman government asked for and received huge subsidies to stimulate home building. An Administrator, Mr. Wilson Wyatt, was appointed and set to work. At the end of a year, the President conceded the complete failure of the Government program. He discharged Wyatt and suspended the program. This year we are building twice as many homes as were built under the Government plan. Many more must still be constructed, but the building industry is already having trouble in getting materials. No one can erect buildings overnight, and there is still no magic legislative formula in sight to change this simple truth. We shall go on building until we meet our requirements. We shall try to hasten the process. Let no one deceive you into believing that Federal subsidies are the answer.

Mr. Wyatt and Mr. Truman have furnished convincing testimony to the contrary.

I should like to conclude my discussion of the special session with a few general observations. The differences in viewpoint between the Republican majority in the Eightieth Congress and the President are fundamental. Mr. Truman would like to fix wages, fix prices, increase Federal taxes, and socialize medicine. The annual budget required to run the Federal Government on his pattern would run to at least $60,000,000,000. Such spending would lead inevitably to higher prices than we now have.

It is easy to criticize any legislative group. Those who are not in power, the Democratic minority and the new party spokesmen enjoy in abundant measure the pleasure of irresponsibility. They can ask for the moon, since they know that they will not be called upon to deliver it. The Democratic Party, in national convention only a few weeks ago, voted in favor of the President's civil-rights program. Before the ink was dry, their elected representatives in the Senate killed that program. They do not mean what they say and they do not say what they mean.

The Progressive Party has confiscated a name which once was graced by the supporters of Teddy Roosevelt. The supporters of this group enjoy a double measure of complete irresponsibility. They swing their blades with absolute indifference at both Republicans and Democrats. When we analyze their criticism we must remember that they oppose the bipartisan foreign policy of our Government, that they are prepared at this critical and uncertain moment in world affairs to turn over every atomic secret we possess to the world at large, that they are more closely identified in their thinking with the Communist Party than with any other current of American life. Need I say more?

I am not one of those who argue that the Eightieth Congress, in either its regular or its special sessions, has achieved perfection. Yet this is the first Congress in the past 16 years to fight for lower taxes. This Congress has taken up the broom to sweep away the wreckage left by the war. We have not finished the job. I am confident that we have begun a stronger, bolder, better effort than the Democrats, Progressives, or Dixiecrats would have undertaken.

I am hopeful that the people of our country will permit us to go forward in 1949 with the completion of these efforts.

Since Seneca Falls

OF

HON. HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mrs. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include an editorial which appeared in the Washington Post on July 22, 1948:

SINCE SENECA FALLS

One event at the recent Democratic National Convention would have given both pride and amusement to that valiant little group of women who a century ago initiated the women's rights movement at Seneca Falls, N. Y. Those who are this week celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of that meeting should add to the credit side of their ledger the fact that for the first time at a national party convention a genuine movement—not the usual phony one—got under way to nominate a woman for Vice President.

It was another instance of feminine triumph over handicap. Representative HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS had the worst spot on the program for a speaker. All the women speakers were shunted to the end of the long night programs, and Representative DOUGLAS addressed a tag-end audience of hot, exhausted delegates in the early hours of the morning. But her speech provoked one of the most significant demonstrations of the convention and a movement, started by an Ohio delegate to nominate her for Vice President, spread rapidly among several delegations. This was promptly discouraged by Representative DOUGLAS because of the boom for Senator BARKLEY, and because she wanted to return to the House. Nevertheless it showed that the day of what Al Smith would have called "baloney" nominations of women for Vice President, as practiced by gallant men delegates at past conventions, was over. It heralded what may happen sooner than we think, even possibly in 1952.

The Seneca Falls women were so unsure of their platform status that they had asked a man to preside at their meeting. Nevertheless their famous "Declaration of Sentiments" drew Nation-wide booing. A long fight lay ahead of them in rectifying even the first of their listed grievances—the inequalities married women suffered in control of their persons, children, and property. Educational, political, and economic disabilities came next on their schedule. Though all of these haven't yet been removed, the feminine progress of the century is indeed something to celebrate. And significantly the one hundredth anniversary of the fight for women's rights comes at a time when a national party convention has dramatically taken its stand for the new civil rights movement, and when a ground swell in behalf of human rights is on throughout the world.

My Record in the Eightieth Congress

OF

HON. HAROLD D. DONOHUE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. DONOHUE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I should like to include a summary of my activities during this Eightieth Congress.

It is incumbent, at all times, upon a person in a position of public trust to recite his record to the people he represents and, in these critical times, when the decisions of our National Government so deeply affect the destiny of the world and our own domestic tranquillity, it is nothing less than a moral obligation for a Representative to submit an account of his stewardship.

It is, of course, practicaly impossible to register every word and detail, but, in the period allowed me, I wish to reveal my stand upon the major issues which were brought before the Eightieth Congress of the United States.

First. Housing: Having entered Congress with the heartfelt conviction, based on prolonged study and experience, that critical shortage of adequate housing facilities for the American people, was our dominant domestic problem, I early introduced a bill to authorize the Federal Government's participation, by loans, in the construction of 200,000 multiple dwelling units for rental purposes. This measure was referred for consideration to the Veterans' Affairs Committee of the House where it received unanimous approval and was then referred to the Committee on Rules where, I regret to say, like so many other worthy proposals, it was allowed to languish. The adoption of the bill would have contributed greatly in alleviating the desperate housing shortage situation; it was accorded the approval of many outstanding housing authorities and social organizations; it was editorially commended in the public press and I plan to reintroduce it in the Eighty-first Congress. It is not intended, in any way, to supplant the overall program contained in the Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill and it would be a valuable supplement to that measure.

I have been in the foreground of those Members who worked valiantly for the acceptance of full-scale housing-relief legislation by the Congress; it was my privilege to be among the early signers of discharge petition No. 6 to remove the companion T-E-W housing bill from the committee so that it could be brought on the floor of the House for consideration; I have, on numerous occasions, appeared before committees and spoken on the House floor on behalf of housing-relief legislation and shall continue my efforts for early action in the next Congress.

I voted for the measure that was placed before the Congress in the closing hours of the special session of July 1948 because it contained a few provisions of moderate assistance toward the eventual cure of our housing crisis but, in my opinion, it falls far short of being adequate.

Second. Inflation and high living costs: The threat of inflation and ever increasing living costs harassing the average American in this postwar period has been of very serious concern to me, as it has been to every conscientious legislator. Along with a good many of my colleagues, whose primary interest is in the continuing welfare of the ordinary working man and woman of the United States, I made many speeches pointing out the danger of the unsound economy policies being pursued which, if not restrained, would inevitably lead to a repetition of our post-World War I economic collapse, with its widespread unemployment and demoralization. In this regard, I filed House Resolution No. 698, calling upon Congress to take effective action against the spread of inflation and the unwarranted high cost of living.

Unfortunately, no substantial legislation was enacted to protect our people who continue to be victims of our current-day inflationary and exorbitant price levels, and my attempts to preserve decent living standards for our citizens shall not be relaxed. Economic collapse in this country would precipitate not only domestic upheaval, but also world despair.

Third. Tax reduction: Believing that there is nothing of more import to the maintenance of the spirit and will of the American people to support the position of world leadership that divine providence saw fit to place upon us than affording some remittance to our heavily burdened taxpayers, I voted for the tax reduction bill because it provided a small measure of relief to the people in the low-income bracket. However, it was and is my studied judgment that the bill was neither wholly adequate or equitable. To explain my position, I should like to quote from the speech I made in the House during the debate on this issue:

> I wish to make it clear that I do not, by any means, think this bill goes far enough in removing the gross inequities of our tax system. A tax system should never be confiscatory, for such a system would destroy the incentive to work, to save, and to progressively invest incomes. It is my opinion that the present bill does not insure these incentives to any individual and businessmen to the extent that it should, and I want to emphasize my conviction that, at the earliest possible moment, in fairness to every American, the Congress should eliminate the inequities still existing, in order to keep the American standard of living on a sound basis.

Fourth. The Marshall plan: I supported and voted for the so-called Marshall plan, because unquestionably the establishment of an economically stable Europe is a prerequisite condition to the continued maintenance of the civilization in which the American way of life is rooted.

After the hairbreadth rescue of the soul of Europe from Hitler's deadly attack, it would be inconceivable to allow the collective European Christian consciousness and personality to disintegrate and yield, in desperation, to the aggressor from the East.

There is no doubt that the countries which participated in the Paris Conference want to preserve their heritage of free political institutions and the rule of law. To do so, they must recover from the economic and social effects of the war.

The next few years can determine whether the countries of Europe will, in fact, be able to hold to their heritage. Economic collapse, spreading through Europe, could persuade the people of these countries to accept the counsel of despair that their basic wants of food and work can be met only by a subjection of their rights under law to totalitarian control. The countries of Europe are not yet in a position to fill for themselves their essential needs for food, fuel, and materials to enable their industries to function adequately. They cannot produce all these needs in Europe. Their exports cannot yet pay for them. They cannot purchase them from their depleted or exhausted capital reserves. A large part of the basic requirements for the western European countries can, at this time, only be met by United States aid. This presents to us a responsibility and a challenge. Western Europe looks to the United States for the extraordinary, yet temporary, support needed during these critical years to permit the regainment of economic vitality and environment in which free institutions can persist.

While I favored this extension of aid, I emphasized that the assurance of success of the program rests primarily on the determination of Europe to work out its own salvation with such help as the American people can give. There can be no success without wholehearted efforts on the part of the western European people themselves.

Fifth. Labor's legal and moral rights must be preserved: I opposed the so-called House omnibus labor bill, H. R. 3020, for the reason that its admitted intention was to radically change the whole range of national labor-management policy built up in the past two decades and, in effect, abolish industry-wide bargaining.

This proposal to weaken labor's position at the bargaining table was placed before us at the very moment soaring prices and swollen profits threatened the Nation with an economic upheaval. It came at a time when management itself was, and is, aghast at its own gains, when the buying power of the Nation's wage and salaried workers was, and still is, lagging dangerously. No one will deny that to maintain the fundamental stability of this Nation, it is imperative that we work out a sound economic balance. A just and wise balance which will keep the wheels of industry turning at high levels of employment, production, and distribution. It is, to say the least, extremely unlikely that the way to security and abundance, to domestic peace and progress, lies along the path of reaction in punitive, not corrective, moves directed against all forms of labor security.

To all intents and purposes the net result of this measure, if pushed to its operative extremes, as will undoubtedly be attempted, will be to open up an area of confusion and controversy involving some 15,000,000 workers and disrupt the socially progressive move in sound labor-management relations that has been steadily advancing for the past 150 years. On this score it is interesting to observe that at recent congressional hearings many of those who had voice in the construction of this legislation advocated revision of its radical provisions and recommended its punitive features be nullified.

Sixth. Displaced Persons Act of 1948: One of the proudest of our American traditions lies in the fact that this country gave harbor to the victims of religious and political persecution. The Pilgrim Fathers came to our shores for those very reasons. America was built by refugees from foreign lands. Immigrant stock has helped make this country what it is today. One has only to think of his own friends and neighbors of Swedish, Polish, Lithuanian, Italian, Jewish, German, French, or other foreign descent, to realize how valuable it has been for us to have an admixture with the blood of other nations. We should not forget that this Nation itself was founded almost altogether by displaced persons.

Because of these considerations I supported and voted for the Displaced Persons Act of 1948. Although it has many inequitable provisions, which must be corrected as soon as possible, it was still a step forward in assuming our just share of the responsibility to solve the whole problem of displaced persons and war refugees.

The United States today is moving into the arena of world politics as a champion of the free people. In enactment of a displaced-persons admission law, we have improved our prestige for world leadership, by giving concrete proof of our concern for free peoples in affording them a chance to be free.

Seventh. Federal workers' pay increases: In my opinion, the best guaranty against a turbulent America in these critical times is the extension of a fair living wage to all our workers both inside and outside of Government employ. Our Government workers, who cannot bargain collectively for increased compensation or strike, must be provided for by congressional action. If this Government is to uphold the tradition of efficient service administered by capable personnel, it must offer the employees wages comparable to other occupations of the same nature.

In considering this legislation, multitudinous, authoritative, unchallenged comparative studies measuring the revised wage scale in private industry with the compensation levels of our Federal employees were presented to the Congress. These studies factually demonstrated the inequities existing, and I voted in favor of salary increases for our Federal employees in order to help them meet personal and family obligations with confidence and a high morale.

Eighth. Selective service: No legislative measure presented to the Congress caused a conscientious Representative more trying days and nights of study, research, and deliberation. With the unenthusiastic but honest conviction that, in the light of increasingly tense world developments, it was an imperative measure designed to preserve the peace and prevent war, I supported it. I pray God that the unsettled conditions dictating approval of this legislation will be dispersed in the very near future by friendly negotiation, understanding, and agreement among the chief powers of the world and by the effective operation of the United Nations.

Ninth. Veterans' Affairs Committee and veterans' legislation: It was my privilege to serve on the House Veterans' Affairs Committee during this Eightieth

Congress. Four hundred and ninety-eight bills and resolutions were referred to the committee for consideration. The full committee held 106 meetings and the subcommittees 56 hearings. A total of 56 bills, 1 House joint resolution, 1 House concurrent resolution, and 2 Senate bills were reported favorably to the House. Of this number, 36 are now public laws, 6 additional passed the House, and 1 was vetoed.

Believing as I do that this country and this Government has a moral duty to prevent the visitation of hardship upon the widows and children of those who died in service, I supported measures to afford them increased allowances. The responsibility of providing every means of rehabilitation to our disabled veterans is undeniable and I favored the measures designed to assist them in taking their rightful place in our national life. Renewing the opportunities of which the average veteran was denied, by reason of his war service, is only the repayment of a just debt, and I voted for those bills which would enable the veteran to pursue his college and on-the-job training without extreme sacrifice and deprivation. It is my personal judgment that reasonable legislation to encourage the war veteran to return to and continue in a normal way of life is decidedly in the public interest and an investment in the democratic preservation of this Nation.

Mr. Speaker, appreciating time limitations, a general listing of other measures I favored and supported would include the following:

Continuation of the school-lunch program, reciprocal-trade-agreement extension, unification of the armed forces, establishment of a National Science Foundation to encourage scientific research and to advance national health, Housing and Rent Act, to extend and increase pensions and annuities to our retired workers of limited income, social-security expansion, appropriation to the Farmers Home Administration, long-range farm program, protective measures for the preservation of small business, provisions for small business to be given a fair share of defense contracts, appropriation for soil conservation and research of natural resources, continuation of the Federal-works program of assistance in community planning and developments, United States participation in the International Refugee Organization, resolutions to strengthen the United Nations, the law to facilitate the admission of alien fiancées of war veterans, oleomargarine-tax repeal, continuation of Atomic Energy Commission research, anti-poll-tax bill, minimum-wage increase, equal-rights amendment, assistance to Greece, Turkey, and China, and many others.

BILLS INTRODUCED

No individual report of this kind could be considered complete without presenting a compilation of the bills and resolutions personally introduced, and I am, therefore, pleased to enumerate them at this point:

H. R. 2922, relief of Charles B. Featherstone, Private Law 373, Eightieth Congress.

H. R. 3154, to amend section 3045 of the Internal Revenue Code.

Mr. Speaker, 2 years ago, following my release from active military service, I presented my qualifications to the voters of the Fourth Congressional District in Massachusetts for the honor and privilege of representing them in the United States Congress.

No man could have helped being deeply inspired and gratified by the confidence the people of the district demonstrated in electing me as their National Representative to the Eightieth Congress.

Since the day of assuming the responsibilities of Congressman, I have worked conscientiously to justify that confidence and trust.

The full facilities of my office have been energetically and courteously extended, at all times, for personal service to my constituents. I have cooperated, on every occasion, with the community agencies, social, fraternal, and racial organizations of my district in the promotion of their various objectives.

The expressed wishes of the majority of the people I represent and a thorough study of the issues involved, have been the foundation of my judgment and action on legislation to advance the best interests of my district and the Nation.

I am happy to present this necessarily brief résumé of my congressional record on domestic and foreign legislative measures to my people, as the basis for my respectful request for reelection as United States Representative to the Eighty-first Congress, from the Fourth Congressional District of Massachusetts.

Farm Price-Support Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mrs. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, it is now perfectly clear that the Republicans do not intend to pass legislation to control high prices. The Republicans have refused to accept the President's inflation-control program, for to do so would mean putting a ceiling on profits—and that is against the basic tenets of the Republican philosophy.

The Republicans are spending their time in this special session cooking up excuses to dish out to the American people for the inflation for which they are largely responsible and about which they now refuse to do anything.

One of the excuses that they are trumping up and preparing to plant carefully in the cities is that the farm price-support program is responsible for high prices. To be sure, they will confine this argument to the cities—it would not go down with the farmers.

Just what is the farm price-support program?

The price-support program is a minimum wage in agriculture. Congress decides what the lowest prices will be on certain given commodities and guarantees the farmer a floor under these minimum prices. If prices in the market fall below the minimum prices set by Congress, the Government comes to the rescue of the farmer to the degree that it has been authorized to do so by Congress.

The price-support program was originally a part of the general program for economic recovery that was initiated by the Democratic administration after it took office in 1933. The original program was one of insuring farmers against economic disaster—against the mistakes and tragedies of the twenties.

Price support initiated in the thirties was a farm insurance program against another depression such as hit the farmer in the last Republican administration.

In the past the farmer had no protection against economic ups and downs. If he had a poor crop he went broke because he could not produce enough to cover his expenses. High prices in the city resulting from scarcity somehow never got back to his pocket. If he had a bumper crop, then he had to sell at low prices because there was more than people needed. The farm-support program delivered the farmer of America out of the clutches of the city speculator.

You see, Mr. Speaker, the big manufacturer can cut his production in order to hold up his prices when he sees trouble ahead—sees his market shrinking. The individual farmer cannot do that. If he cuts his production he goes broke and hits the road as a migrant.

For example, between 1929 and 1933 auto production dropped 80 percent but auto prices dropped only 16 percent. Between 1929 and 1933 iron and steel production dropped 83 percent but iron and steel prices dropped only 20 percent.

In this same period—which you will remember, Mr. Speaker, was the period of the depression years—while agricultural production dropped only 6 percent agricultural prices fell 63 percent.

This tells the story, Mr. Speaker, and shows why the Democrats initiated the price-support program, and why the Republicans have continued to support it. It was worked out by a Democratic administration so that the farmer could go ahead and produce without fear that his production would land him in the poor house.

The price-support program is a deflationary influence in that it is an incentive to production.

In other words, price support does not hold prices up any more than a parachute on an aviator holds him up when he is flying in his airplane. The price-support program, like a parachute, is a safety device that reassures the farmer against a possible crack-up. The Republicans are trying to blame the high number on the altimeter on the parachute.

The price-support program remained on an insurance basis until 1941 when it became imperative to greatly increase agricultural production if we were to have enough food to feed ourselves and help those countries under our lend-lease program who were resisting the Germans. At that time price support levels were substantially increased to encourage maximum production. Farmers were assured they would continue to have price supports at these relatively high levels until they had had time to reconvert their operations to peacetime conditions.

We are now operating under price-support legislation that will expire January 1, 1949. The Republicans, who write and control all legislation that comes to the floor, brought in and passed virtually the same price-support program for next year as the one under which we are now operating. It begins January 1, 1949, and runs to January 1, 1950.

In other words, they passed the price-support program for next year with minimum prices for farmers pegged, in the great majority, at the same level they have been pegged for the last 2 years. And they did this at the same time that they were preparing to tell the city folk that this program is responsible for the high price of food.

But the Republicans went even further than this in their endorsement of the price-support program. The night before they closed up Congress to go to their convention in Philadelphia, between 4:30 and 5 o'clock in the morning, they brought to the floor of the House another price-support program from the Senate to begin—when do you think?—in 1950 and to continue until—when do you think—forever!

The Republicans were so eager to make the farmers of America think they were their friends that they wrote and passed a price-support program that would take effect a year and a half from now.

One would think that Congress was going to take a sabbatical.

At the same time they were using price supports as an excuse for high prices, they were breaking their necks to prove to the farmers that price supports would be continued under a Republican administration, if elected, just as they had under this Republican Congress.

This attempt to decorate the Philadelphia convention in colors appealing to the farmers was put through, as I said, between 4:30 and 5 in the morning on the last night of the session—put through without the House Committee on Agriculture having held any hearings on the bill or having been given an opportunity to even look at it.

So, we see, Mr. Speaker, that no one seriously proposes to upset the confidence the farmers derive from this insurance even if some are going to harangue about it in this coming campaign.

I do not believe it is generally realized, Mr. Speaker, that price supports do not cover all commodities.

They first covered only the six basic commodities—wheat, corn, cotton, rice, peanuts, and tobacco.

When the war in Europe demanded a greater production of food, additional commodities were guaranteed a minimum price. They were known as the mandatory Steagall commodities—hogs, chickens, eggs, turkeys, milk (wholesale), butterfat, dry edible beans, dry field peas, potatoes, sweetpotatoes, flaxseed, and soybeans.

You will observe, Mr. Speaker, that there is no price support on anything that goes into hamburger that has gone from 42 cents a pound to $1 a pound—whether you are talking about cow meat or horse meat.

No, Mr. Speaker, price supports are not responsible for the high prices the housewife has to pay at the corner grocery store to feed her family.

The following examples illustrate how far below the market prices the farmer receives are the minimum government-guaranteed prices:

The average price received by the farmer for wheat in 1947 was $2.31 a bushel. The support price was $1.84.

The farmer received an average of $2.76 a bushel for corn in 1947. But the support price was only $1.35 a bushel.

And now let us talk about hogs, Mr. Speaker. Every housewife knows what has happened to the price of pork chops, sausage, bacon, and ham since 1946.

The Republicans need not think they can now cry "price supports" and thus escape their responsibility for the removal of price controls.

In 1947 the farmer received an average of $20.10 per 100 pounds for hogs. The support price was far below this—$15.60 in the spring and $16.50 in the fall of 1947. On last July 15, the farmers were receiving $25.90 per hundredweight for hogs.

No, Mr. Speaker, the "support price" cry of some Republicans is not going to justify the failure of the Republican Party to do anything about the cost of food in this special session.

We had the same price supports in 1946 but the housewife was able to buy bacon for 42 cents a pound. Why? Because we had OPA and profits were kept within reasonable limits. The housewife was not left to the mercy of the profiteers. Today a pound of bacon costs 65 cents a pound for the cheapest grade at the cheapest chain store. A pound of pork chops in 1946 under OPA cost 38 cents. Today for that same pound of pork chops the housewife pays 85 cents. A pound of sausage under OPA was 45 cents. Today, it is 65 cents. And so it goes. I will not even mention the cost of ham today, Mr. Speaker, the figures are too frightening.

Those who are responsible for removing price controls before our economy was ready for it are responsible for the high prices the housewife has to pay for her food today, and not the price-support program. The prices the farmer receives are above the Government-guaranteed prices on everything except potatoes, and occasionally eggs.

LET'S TALK ABOUT POTATOES, MR. SPEAKER

Let us talk about potatoes, Mr. Speaker, in 1946. At every turn the consumer is fed the story of potatoes as the reason that he has to pay 50 percent more for his food today than he did in 1946 under

OPA. Just what is this story of potatoes?

Early in the war the Government asked farmers to increase their production of potatoes in order to insure an adequate food supply in this country and raised the guaranteed minimum price they were to receive. At that time the Government agreed to support the price of potatoes at not less than 90 percent of parity.

In 1946, due to unusually favorable weather conditions and improved production techniques, farmers produced 100,000,000 bushels of potatoes more than they had ever produced before. We found ourselves in 1946 with a crop of potatoes over and above what was needed or could be consumed, with the result that the price of potatoes dropped, and dropped below the minimum price guaranteed by Congress to the farmers.

The Government—Agricultural Department—was forced to buy large quantities of potatoes, because the Congress has passed legislation authorizing it to do just that if the price of potatoes dropped below a certain level. In this way farmers were saved from going broke.

Some potatoes were unavoidably lost because of prohibitive freight charges, but no potatoes were wasted or destroyed until all possible outlets had been utilized. The Government exhausted all possible means of using the potatoes. They were used for cattle feed, starch, flour, glucose, the school-lunch program; a small amount of potatoes were exported, and some potatoes were used to make alcohol.

The Government sold the potatoes it bought up from the farmers to private industry at the best price it could get, and industry then converted the potatoes into the above-mentioned commodities. The Government paid the farmer the support price and then took the loss between that support price and what private industry would pay for the potatoes.

But we are talking about 1946, Mr. Speaker, the year at which the Republicans like to point since the Democrats set the price-support figure for 1946. But what about 1947 and 1948, Mr. Speaker, years when the Republicans had the votes to cut the support price of potatoes?

It is now perfectly apparent that with improved production techniques the minimum price for potatoes is pegged too high. Did the Republicans lower this minimum price in this Congress? They did not. They extended it to cover the entire crop of 1948, even though it is to be marketed in 1949. They fail to include this fact when they talk about potatoes.

The answer to the potato story, Mr. Speaker, is this. If the voters object to the Government's buying up potatoes, they ought to direct their complaints to the Eightieth Congress who insisted on continuing, beyond the date when it would have otherwise expired, mandatory support of potatoes at 90 percent of parity, after it was obvious that this support price in view of increased production was too high.

Mr. Speaker, the following chart prepared by the Department of Agriculture gives the price received by farmers and support levels in 1947–48, the year in which the tremendous increase in the cost of food has taken place:

Prices received by farmers and support-price levels, United States, 1947–48

You will notice, Mr. Speaker, that in this chart, with the exception of dried prunes and beans, there are no supports under fruits and vegetables, yet the housewife pays 16 percent more for her fruits and vegetables in the corner grocery store than she did a year ago.

Under OPA in 1946 a housewife could buy a good leg of lamb for 39 cents a pound. The cheapest leg of lamb today in the lowest-priced chain store costs 75 cents.

There is no price support under lamb, Mr. Speaker.

In 1946, under OPA, a family could enjoy a porterhouse steak. It could be had for 49 cents a pound. The cheapest grade of porterhouse today cannot be had for less than 89 cents. Steak was priced out of the average family's budget months ago. And so were lamb chops, leg of lamb, and rib roast.

There are no price supports under beef and lamb, Mr. Speaker.

The Government does not export beef or lamb, either, Mr. Speaker. That is another Republican myth that needs exploding.

We do not export any meat that Americans like to eat under our ERP program, Mr. Speaker. What we do export is a little horse meat. But that is not our most-inflated commodity. It is not horse meat over which the American housewife is concerned.

EXPORTS

Mr. Speaker, while we are talking about exports I think we had better have a few figures on the subject.

Before the war we exported about 2.6 percent of the United States' food supply. We exported in 1947, 8.7 percent of our food supply.

In 1948 it is estimated that we will export at a rate of about 7 percent of our food supply.

Sixty to sixty-five percent of the total export tonnage is wheat. Fifteen to twenty percent is in other grains. In other words, from 75 to 85 percent of the total export tonnage is in grain.

It is important to note, Mr. Speaker, that the total food production in 1948 is about one-third greater than the prewar average. It is therefore ridiculous to assume that exports have had a serious impact on the domestic price structure.

The fact remains that prices are high and someone has to blame somebody.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me say that if the Republicans were really against price supports, why did they keep us until 5 o'clock in the morning extending price supports indefinitely into the future?

I am inserting a table which shows the increase in foods at the corner grocery store since price controls were removed in 1946. The table also indicates the relative importance of these foods in the family's market basket.

The Call of the Special Session and the Program Recommended for Enactment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. RALPH E. CHURCH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I am constrained to say a few words with respect to President Truman's call of this special session of Congress and the program he has recommended for enactment.

The time, the place, and the circumstances under which President Truman publicly announced that he would reconvene Congress in this special session made it obvious to the vast majority of the American people, regardless of political faith, that he was using the extraordinary constitutional power vested in him to convene Congress for emergency purposes solely as a political maneuver. The political purpose of this extraordinary action of Mr. Truman was confirmed by the broad scope and far-reaching character of the proposals embodied in his message to Congress. There was very little in his message of an emergency nature. He even included the many proposals which the Democratic administrations over the last 14 years have failed to enact when they were in complete control of the Government with overwhelming majorities in both the House and the Senate.

It was not the public interest that prompted Mr. Truman to call us into this extraordinary session. Were he really interested in the various measures he mentioned in his message, he surely would have told us that he expected Congress to remain in session all summer to deal with these various matters. As a matter of fact, during the crucial weeks of the close of the regular session, Mr. Truman himself made a so-called nonpolitical trip across the country to try to save his waning political fortunes. It is perfectly evident to me, as I am sure it is to the people of my district, that the only emergency that prompted Mr. Truman to reconvene Congress at no little expense to the taxpayers is the emergency with respect to his political future.

Mr. Truman's political purpose was further confirmed by the fact that when Congress reconvened and our committees began consideration of his various recommendations, the administration officials themselves had not yet worked out the details with respect to those recommendations and were not prepared to testify. It was only after considerable delay and some pressure from the Congress itself that the administration officials appeared before the committees. When they did appear, their testimony represented a confusion of ideas and directly conflicting opinions as to what ought to be done.

It is to the great credit of the Congress that we have not seen fit to allow such political considerations to influence us in our decisions as to what should be done in the public interest. We have recognized that the rise in prices has brought grave hardship to many of our people. We have sought to deal with this problem in the American way.

Mr. Truman is really not concerned about the inflationary spiral. He already has many legal powers under existing law which he could have exercised many months ago toward relieving the inflationary pressure on the demand side of the price equation. For example, President Truman already has the power to limit consumer credit, but he has never seen fit to exercise it. It is also a significant fact that the Federal Reserve Board has never exercised the power it has with respect to reserve requirements in the case of the Federal Reserve banks of Chicago and New York City—the two largest banking cities in the United States.

Every reputable economist agrees that the inflationary situation that confronts the country is due in large part to the loose fiscal policies of the administration of the last several years. Government spending and deficit financing have been major contributing factors. Yet in the very message that Mr. Truman gives lip service to the dangers of inflation, he proposes a program which would increase Government spending. He proposes a program which would increase our annual Federal budget to at least $60,000,000,000. In other words, however meritorious the specific proposals in themselves may be, his over-all program would tend to increase inflation. The only method by which he believes prices can be controlled is by the institution of the OPA, which he himself at one time characterized as police-state methods and which he himself at one time publicly stated should never be employed in a free, peacetime economy.

He would have us believe that there can be a selective price-control system and doubtless there are many people who believe that such a system would be workable. I personally disagree. If you control the price of steel, you must necessarily control the wages of the steel workers and control the price of all of the materials that enter into the finished steel product. If you control the price of bread, you must necessarily control the price of wheat or perhaps some other grain that may be used in the production of bread. In short, Mr. Speaker, everyone knows that the unorthodox method of controlling prices such as proposed by President Truman must necessarily mean the complete regimentation of our whole economy. Our past experience has already demonstrated that such methods tend to retard production and in the end create stagnation of the great productive powers that we have in this great, free country.

I would like to say a word or two with respect to the question of housing, as this seems to be the second major point in the President's message. That there is a housing shortage no one can deny, and this is particularly true in the city areas. The question is not whether there is a housing shortage, but what is the best procedure for solving this immediate problem.

President Truman would have the people believe that it is due to the failure of this Congress that our people, and especially our veterans to whom we owe so much, are unable to obtain adequate housing accommodations. But the facts should speak for themselves. In 1946 only 473,800 dwelling units were completed. At that time the New Deal was operating under its so-called emergency housing program. It was a system of controls and regulations. It proved to be a failure. Because of this failure, the houses that the people need today are not available.

The significant fact is that in 1947, after this Congress removed all of these New Deal controls and regulations, the number of housing units completed in that year was almost twice the number completed in 1946. And, Mr. Speaker, this year no less than 1,000,000 dwelling units will be built. This is the largest number of dwelling units constructed in any 1 year in the whole history of the United States.

It is true that the houses now being built are beyond reach of the pocketbook of the average man. I am inclined to believe that by appropriate amendments to existing law and sound administration it can be possible for the Federal Government to aid in making low-cost housing units available to the average man. This can be done through private enterprise and it can be done without the large Government expenditures out of limited funds.

I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that I am somewhat proud of the manner in which we have approached both of these fundamental problems during this special session. We have not allowed political considerations to influence our decisions. We have refused to follow the course of political expediency. We have rejected New Deal panaceas. We have sought to follow that course which in the long run will best serve the interests of our people.

I think this much should be added. The people must recognize that the failures of the Truman administration itself and the administrations which preceded it in the field of foreign affairs have necessitated unanticipated expenditures for national defense. If I recall correctly, and it so happens I am privileged to serve on the Committee on Appropriations, the expenditures and contract authorizations for defense purposes for the fiscal years 1948 and 1949 will exceed $24,000,000,000. We are glad to make the sacrifices necessary that we may have security in an unsettled world. The fact that we have never realized permanent peace is due in no small measure to the lack of direction, the bungling, and the vacillations of the incompetent Democratic administrations, past and present. Moreover, we are making extensive shipments of goods abroad in a foreign-aid program. Without regard to the merits of the program or to its wisdom, the fact is that this program has added to the inflationary pressure on both the demand side and the supply side of the price equation. In other words, we have this large foreign demand for our goods, and at the same time we have a limited supply in the United States. This program was recommended by President Truman and adopted by the Congress because of an apparent conviction that it was necessary to meet the spread of communism. But it must be said that Russia today would not occupy the important place it does in the world were it not for the failure of the present Administration and its predecessors to deal effectively with this problem during the war and in the days following.

In his demagogic fashion, President Truman has tried to make it appear that corporation profits are exorbitant. He has recommended that the old excess-profits tax law be reenacted. This is the very law that former Secretary of the Treausry Vinson himself stated before the Committee on Ways and Means was a drag on production. I have not had occasion to examine all the figures with respect to corporate profits. I have seen a sufficient number of them to know that in terms of dollars they are larger this year than in the previous years. What is overlooked, however, is that the purchasing power of the dollar, not only with respect to individuals, but also with respect to corporations, is considerably less than in previous years. The dollar figure is not in itself a true measure. It must be taken into account that to attain an expanding production new plants must be built and new facilities constructed. The replacement value of practically every plant in the United States is today considerably greater than it was yesterday. In other words, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Truman's recommendation in this instance and in so many other instances is purely political. It seems to me that he is willing to sacrifice the public welfare in the interest of political expediency. He is more interested in the political consequences of his recommendations than in the economic results. I am constrained to say that it is my view that this special session of Congress and the various recommendations of President Truman make it clear that it is political power and not the public interest that guides his actions.

American Growth—Answer to the Soviets

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE H. BENDER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, one of the familiar Russian slogans in the Soviet Union's unending propaganda campaign against the capitalist world is the oft-repeated slander that the United States has reached the end of its productive growth. Borrowing the theory advanced by some New Deal "economists" in the 1930's, they have asserted repeatedly that America's "frontiers have been exhausted," that we had reached the point of diminishing returns and that henceforth our economy could be sustained only by resort to heavy Government spending.

This line of reasoning is hardly in keeping with the revelations just published by our Census Bureau. In the 8 years since 1940, the population of the three Pacific Coast States of California, Washington, and Oregon has risen by some 40 percent. An increase in factory building throughout the war years has lifted the productive capacity of the South and West by 100 percent. New metal and chemical industries along the Pacific coast have altered greatly the whole economy of the West, and it is clear from plans already being explored that still greater developments may take place within the near future in the development of steel and fabricating units throughout the Northwest.

Certainly, this huge increase in population in the West, achieved without disrupting the established economy of other sectors of the Nation, points to a continuous frontier of industrial growth. America's future is as unlimited as the ingenuity of its people and their desire for a better, more satisfying life for every man, woman, and child here and throughout the world.

Teachers' Lobby

HON. HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mrs. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following article from the Democrat of August 1948, and an editorial from the St. Louis Star-Times of August 5, 1948:

[From the Democrat of August 1948]

FACTS REBUT DEWEY SLUR—TEACHERS' LOBBY SPENT ONLY $5,377—YET GOP NOMINEE CALLED IT MOST VICIOUS AND NOW MAINTAINS STRANGE SILENCE

America's school teachers—described by Gov. Thomas E. Dewey as being "the most vicious lobby in the country"—spent exactly $5,377 during 1947 trying to sell Congress on support of legislation giving Federal financial assistance to the Nation's public schools.

Disclosed this week by Washington newsmen who went into congressional records to produce the sworn expense statement of the National Education Association, principal spokesmen for the country's classroom educators, the $5,377 expense item was sharp rebuttal of Governor Dewey's denunciation of the lobbying activities of teachers. Governor Dewey had earlier labeled the teachers as a lobby "worse than the liquor lobby, worse than the oil lobby" while speaking before the national governors' conference at Portsmouth, N. H.

CONTRAST IN SPENDING

By way of contrast with the small sum expended by the teachers—a sum that included salary of their national legislative representative—lobbies of big business interests spend a hundredfold. The Committee for Constitutional Government, Inc., lobbying principally for the Taft-Hartley Labor Act and for tax reductions on large incomes, spent $460,903 in 1947. The power lobby, through the National Association of Electric Companies, expended $256,742 in the same period.

The real estate lobby, generally credited with blocking House action on the long-range T-E-W housing bill, spent $213,022 through two different groups, the National Association of Real Estate Boards and the National Home and Property Owners Foundation.

DEWEY IS SILENT

Meanwhile Governor Dewey, in the seclusion of his country estate in New York State, kept strangely silent as the controversy over his teacher-slurring remarks boiled across the country and into far-away Alaska. From Dewey's press secretary came one word—"rubbish"—in reply to growing demands that Governor Dewey issue a formal statement affirming or denying remarks attributed to him.

First of the governors to publicly challenge Governor Dewey for these statements was Gov. Herbert B. Maw, of Utah. Another governor, Ernest Gruening, of Alaska, confirmed, when questioned from Washington, the statement of Governor Maw.

Governor Gruening said that Dewey declared "the teachers' lobby is the worst of all lobbies."

Previously Governor Maw had reported that Dewey called the teachers' lobby vicious.

Dewey's remarks were made June 15 at the governors' conference in Portsmouth, N. H. The New York Governor's statements were revealed first by Drew Pearson, a syndicated columnist.

Governor Gruening said that Dewey told members of the governors' conference he thought the time had come to launch a counter campaign against what Dewey called the teachers' lobby.

"Dewey described it as the worst of all lobbies * * * the only lobby I've ever had trouble with in New York," Gruening stated.

"Amplifying this startling remark, the New York Governor said that the taxpayers were receiving only 30 cents' value of every dollar spent on education. To support this amazing contention, Governor Dewey went on to declare that teachers worked only 40 weeks a year, and a 5-day week at that. He said he knew that the teachers' lobby was invading the various States when their legislatures were in session 'propagating the lie that they are underpaid and that the States were not doing a job for them.'

MET OPPOSITION

"After making these statements, Governor Dewey asked the governors to engage in a counterattack to 'expose the lobby.' To this proposal several governors, including Warren, of California; Mabry, of New Mexico; and Hunt, of Wyoming, objected most vigorously. The matter was then dropped."

Following Governor Gruening's statement, Governor Maw suggested that Dewey tell participants in the discussions of the teacher's lobby at an executive session of the Governors' Conference that they are released from any secrecy obligation imposed on them.

"I cannot believe that Governor Dewey wishes to have other Governors feel bound to keep his remarks secret while the New York Governor is busy issuing denials of accurate versions of his remarks. * * *

"But the public will be deprived of the complete story unless Governor Dewey releases those present from any obligations to remain silent on his statements.

"If Governor Dewey will take this action, I will be able to amplify considerably the Governor's position on schools and the teaching profession, and I am certain that other Governors will be able to do the same. Meantime, I shall limit my remarks on this issue to the statements made by Governor Dewey in public prior to the executive session."

Both Governor Gruening and Governor Maw stated that Gov. Earl Warren, of California, disagreed with Governor Dewey when the New Yorker attacked America's teachers.

But Governor Warren has refused to comment on Dewey's statements or on his argument with Dewey over the charges against the teachers.

TRUMAN VERSUS DEWEY ON EDUCATION

President Truman and Gov. Thomas E. Dewey have different ideas about education in the United States.

The President recognizes the need for better educational facilities and better salaries for teachers.

But Governor Dewey thinks efforts by teachers to increase their salaries are "vicious."

Here are the remarks of the two men:

President Truman

The President said in a speech June 14, 1948:

"I appointed a commission to make a survey of the educational situation in this country. That commission made a formidable report, and pointed out exactly what the conditions in the schools in this country are today; and I made a recommendation to the Congress that the Federal Government make a contribution to the support of the schools of the Nation.

"No action. No action. It's the most disgraceful thing in this country that the teachers * * * are not adequately paid. There are conditions in nearly all public schools in the country where the tecaher has so many pupils under her care that she doesn't have time to learn all their names. Something must be done about that."

Governor Dewey

The day after President Truman spoke in Los Angeles Governor Dewey said at the annual Governor's conference in New Hampshire:

"It (the teachers' lobby) is the most vicious in the Nation today. If it isn't stepped on now, it will destroy the Nation.

"It's worse than the power lobby, the real-estate lobby, the oil lobby, the liquor lobby, and a lot of others."

Note: In 1947, lobbyists reported they spent $5,000,000 in attempting to influence Congress. The National Education Association, the lobby to which Governor Dewey was referring, said its legislative-Federal relations division spent only $5,377 last year—about 1 percent of all lobbying expenditures reported to Congress.

It is surprising that Dewey and Warren ended up on the same ticket since they are known to disagree violently on this question.

[From the St. Louis (Mo.) Star-Times of August 5, 1948]

DEWEY AND THE TEACHERS

The Democratic National Committee sniffs fair game in the alleged remarks of Governor Dewey about the Nation's teachers at the recent governor's conference. Despite denials, it is quoting two participants in the conference as saying that the New York governor called the teachers' lobby "the most vicious in the Nation today" and charged it with "propagating the lie that they (the teachers) are underpaid."

The governors quoted—Herbert Maw, of Utah, and Ernest Gruening, of Alaska—are Democrats, of course, and some allowance can be made for partisan interpretation of a situation that can make presidential campaign material. Their readiness to go into detail, however, makes it hard for Mr. Dewey's followers to insist that they are talking about something that never took place. Mr. Gruening says Governor Dewey asked the other governors to join in a campaign to expose the lobby and names several governors who objected.

The desire of the Dewey camp to avoid an airing of the incident—if it took place—is understandable. Politicians are extremely wary about being placed on record against demands for betterment of schools and the lot of the teachers. Silence in this instance, however, is not doing Mr. Dewey any good. As a matter of fact, the teachers' lobby, like any other lobby, should be subject to wide-open discussion. If it is overplaying its hand, it should be checked.

Far better for Mr. Dewey, it would seem, would be a detailed statement of just what he said or meant to say and why he said it. As matters stand, he is vulnerable to the Democrats' charge that he is unsympathetic with teachers' demands. That would cost him some support in the forthcoming election. But more important is the way an incident of this kind can be built into a charge that he lacks the candor and courage that Americans look for in a national leader.

Fiftieth Anniversary of Annexation of Hawaii

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH R. FARRINGTON

DELEGATE FROM HAWAII

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. FARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, August 12 is a significant date in the lives of the people of Hawaii and of the continental United States.

Fifty years ago, on August 12, 1898, the Republic of Hawaii became an American Territory. At high noon on that day, the flag of the Hawaiian Nation was hauled down the flagpole over Tolani Palace in Honolulu and the Stars and Stripes raised in its place. With a few simple words, Sanford B. Dole, Hawaii's first President, yielded to United States Minister Sewell "the sovereignty and public property of the Hawaiian Islands." The U. S. S. Philadelphia in Honululu Harbor fired a 21-gun salute, and the act was completed.

This ceremony solemnized the action of Congress a month earlier, when it approved a joint resolution authorizing the cession.

It is interesting to look back and see what Congress then felt about this step which extended America's frontier 2,400 miles into the Pacific and brought under the American flag one of the most strategic areas in the world.

One of the arguments that was brought against annexation during the congressional debate was that the boundaries of the United States had already been determined and that the addition of new territory would destroy the compactness of the Union. It was an old argument that had been used every time an addition to the Thirteen Original States had been proposed, as Mr. Henry, of Indiana, pointed out.

Not one argument—

Mr. Henry said—

has been advanced in the course of this debate against annexation that was not made when former annexations of territory were under consideration.

Grave statesmen then, as now, insisted that the boundaries of the United States should not be extended, that compactness of territory was necessary, that it would not do to annex any territory where the inhabitants were not homogeneous and suited to American citizenship, that to commence the extension of our boundaries meant aggrandizement and would surely weaken the bonds of our Union. A careful perusal of the past will soon satisfy anyone that in the opposition to this resolution nothing new has been developed.

Mr. Hitt, of Illinois, added:

The ultimate annexation of the Hawaiian Islands to the United States is not a new question. Every President except one for half a century has notified the nations of the earth that the people of these islands could never unite their destinies with any nation except our own.

Because of Hawaii's mixed population some objected that the people of Hawaii would not fit into the American pattern of culture.

Mr. Pearce, of Missouri, replied:

The contention, therefore, that there is any antagonism—physical, moral or intellectual, or social—between the people who can be regarded as permanent residents of the Hawaiian Islands and the people of the United States is no more valid than the early contention that the people of Louisiana, Texas, New Mexico, and California would never coalesce with the Anglo-Saxon population of the Original States.

As further evidence of the essentially American character of the islands at that date Mr. Henry declared that Hawaii's schools "are as well-managed and as prosperous as in any American community, and compare favorably with those of the grand old State of Pennsylvania."

Mr. Alexander, of New York, offered this observation:

For 70 years they have been living under the influences of American civilization. They speak and study our language; the Stars and Stripes are as familiar as their own flag; their laws are copied from those of the United States; their rulers, whether under the Crown or the Republic, have been largely of American birth or ancestry; they know and see only United States money; the English is the language of their courts and the educated classes, and among their holidays are the Fourth of July, Decoration Day, and Washington's and Lincoln's birthdays.

Outside of the United States, there is no people so American, so closely allied with our institutions, and so well acquainted with our history and our life.

The strategic and commercial value of the mid-Pacific islands was, of course, recognized long before annexation. During the annexation debate, Mr. Hitt, who was chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, cited a statement made by one Admiral Dupont in 1851. The admiral said:

It is impossible to estimate too highly the value and importance of the Sandwich Islands, whether in a military or commercial point of view. Should circumstances ever place them in our hands, they would prove the most important acquisition in the whole Pacific Ocean—an acquisition intimately connected with our commercial and naval supremacy in both seas.

I think it is safe to say that events have proved that this was no overstatement.

The form of government the islands should have if annexed was debated at length. Mr. Pearce expressed the opinion of the majority when he said:

I will vote for the Territorial government in Hawaii. In my opinion, it will have a territorial government, it will have a territorial legislature, and it will have judicial officers, a government in short, of the same or similar character as that which exists in Arizona, in New Mexico, in Oklahoma, and in Alaska. People who imagine that the constitutional electors of Hawaii are incapable of self-government, or lacking in intelligence, or are unlettered or illiterate, are very much mistaken.

As the debate wore on, with every conceivable facet of annexation being explored and reexplored, Mr. Hitt rose in the House on June 11 and declared:

There has been so much discussion throughout the country, such manifest impatience for its consideration here, that at last there is a pretty clear perception by almost everyone that the annexation resolution before us is in response and obedience to the demands of the whole country.

I think that the constituency of nine-tenths of the gentlemen here, if they could utter their will by votes, would command us to promptly pass this resolution. Our votes in passing * * * will voice the earnest purpose of the American people; the conservative sentiment of the country is expressed by it, as a measure for the welfare, for the security, and prosperity of the whole Nation. Let us pass it and carry out the will of the American people.

Even while annexation was being discussed, Congress was looking ahead to Hawaii's future political status. Throughout the debate, the question of statehood arose again and again.

For example, Senator Spooner, of West Virginia, asked Senator Stewart, of Nevada, whether he felt that under the power to admit a Territory into the Union as a State, Congress acquires this Territory with a view to statehood.

Senator Stewart replied:

If it ever becomes in a condition fit for statehood, that, according to the decision, must rest in the sound discretion of Congress.

Currency Depreciation—155 Years Ago and Today

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL A. REED

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, the New Dealers who advocate a return to the OPA price fixing, regimentation, and policing by State sleuths, may profit by reading the experience of the past under such a regime.

I recall the deep impression made on me as a student at Cornell University by the lectures of Dr. Andrew D. White on the subject of fiat money.

Under leave to extend, I am inserting the quotations from Andrew D. White's book, as published by the Economists' National Committee on Monetary Policy:

I. A LESSON IN CURRENCY DEPRECIATION AND PRICE FIXING

From Andrew Dickson White's Fiat Money Inflation in France (pamphlet reprint, as published by The Duke Endowment, 1933, dealing with the situation in France, 1789 to approximately 1800), pages 40–43:

"The third outgrowth of the vast issue of fiat money was the maximum. As far back as November 1792, * * * St. Just, in view of the steady rise in prices of the necessaries of life, had proposed a scheme by which these prices should be established by law, at a rate proportionate to the wages of the working classes. This plan lingered in men's minds, taking shape in various resolutions and decrees until the whole culminated on September 29, 1793, in the law of the maximum.

"While all this legislation was high-handed, it was not careless. Even statesmen of the greatest strength, having once been drawn into this flood, were borne on into excesses which, a little earlier, would have appalled them. Committees of experts were appointed to study the whole subject of prices, and at last there were adopted the great 'four rules' which seemed to statesmen of that time a masterly solution of the whole difficulty.

"First, the price of each article of necessity was to be fixed at one and one-third its price in 1790. Secondly, all transportation was to be added at a fixed rate per league. Thirdly, 5 percent was to be added for the profit of the wholesaler. Fourthly, 10 percent was to be added for the profit of the retailer. Nothing could look more reasonable. Great was the jubilation. The report was presented and supported by Barrère * * * then in all the glory of his great orations. * * * He poured contempt over political economy as 'that science which quacks have corrupted, which pedants have obscured, and which academicians have depreciated.' France, he said, has something better, and he declared in conclusion, 'The needs of the people will no longer be spied upon in order that the commercial classes may arbitrarily take advantage.'

"The first result of the maximum was that every means was taken to evade the fixed price imposed, and the farmers brought in as little produce as they possibly could. This increased the scarcity, and the people of the large cities were put on an allowance.

* * * * *

"Shopkeepers * * * could not sell such goods without ruin. The result was that very many went out of business and the remainder forced buyers to pay enormous charges under the very natural excuse that the seller risked his life in trading at all. That this excuse was valid is easily seen by the daily lists of those condemned to the guillotine, in which not infrequently figure the names of men charged with violating the maximum laws. Manufacturers were very generally crippled and frequently destroyed, and agriculture was fearfully depressed. To detect goods concealed by farmers and shopkeepers, a spy system was established with a reward to the informer of one-third of the value of the goods discovered. To spread terror, the criminal tribunal at Strassburg was ordered to destroy the dwelling of anyone found guilty of selling goods above the price set by law. The farmer often found that he could not raise his products at anything like the price required by the new law, and when he tried to hold back his crops or cattle, alleging that he could not afford to sell them at the prices fixed by law, they were frequently taken from him by force and he was fortunate if paid even in the depreciated fiat money—fortunate, indeed, if he finally escaped with his life.

"Involved in all these perplexities, the convention tried to cut the Gordian knot. It decreed that any person selling gold or silver coin, or making any difference in any transaction between paper and specie, should be imprisoned in irons for 6 years—that anyone who refused to accept a payment in assignats, or accepted assignats at a discount, should pay a fine of 3,000 francs; and that anyone committing this crime a second time should pay a fine of 6,000 francs and suffer imprisonment 20 years in irons. Later, on the 8th of September 1793, the penalty for such offenses was made death, with confiscation of the criminal's property, and a reward was offered to any person informing the authorities regarding any such criminal transaction. To reach the climax of ferocity, the convention decreed, in May 1794, that the death penalty should be inflicted on any person convicted of having asked, before a bargain was concluded, in what money payment was to be made. Nor was this all. The great finance minister, Cambon, soon saw that the worst enemies of his policy were gold and silver. Therefore it was that, under his lead, the convention closed the exchange and finally, on November 13, 1793, under terrifying penalties, suppressed all commerce in the precious metals. About a year later came the abolition of the maximum itself.

"It is easily seen that these maximum laws were perfectly logical. Whenever any nation entrusts to its legislators the issue of a currency not based on the idea of redemption in standard coin recognized in the commerce of civilized nations, it entrusts to them the power to raise or depress the value of every article in the possession of every citizen."

From White's pages 5–7:

"It would be a great mistake to suppose that the statesmen of France, or the French people, were ignorant of the dangers in issuing irredeemable paper money. No matter how skillfully the bright side of such a currency was exhibited, all thoughtful men in France remembered its dark side. They knew too well, from that ruinous experience, 70 years before, in John Law's time, the difficulties and dangers of a currency not well based and controlled. They had then learned how easy it is to issue it; how difficult it is to check its overissue; how seductively it leads to the absorption of the means of the workingmen and men of small fortunes; how heavily it falls on all those living on fixed incomes, salaries, or wages; how securely it creates on the ruins of the prosperity of all men of meager means a class of debauched speculators * * *; how it stimulates overproduction at first and leaves every industry flaccid afterward; how it breaks down thrift and develops political and social immorality. All this France had been thoroughly taught by experience. Many then living had felt the result of such an experiment—the issues of paper money under John Law, a man who to this day is acknowledged one of the most ingenious financiers the world has ever known; and there were then sitting in the National Assembly of France many who owed the poverty of their families to those issues of paper. Hardly a man in the country who had not heard those who issued it cursed as the authors of the most frightful catastrophe France had then experienced."

* * * * *

"But the current paper money had become irresistible. It was constantly urged * * * that if any nation could safely issue it, France was now that nation; that she was fully warned by her severe experience under John Law; that she was now a constitutional government, controlled by an enlightened, patriotic people * * *."

II. TODAY, IN THE UNITED STATES: IN THE LIGHT OF LESSONS OF THE PAST

(a) President Truman recommended on November 17, 1947, as an "immediate anti-inflation program," the following legislative action:

"First. To restore consumer credit controls and to restrain the creation of inflationary bank credit.

"Second. To authorize the regulation of speculative trading on the commodity exchanges.

"Third. To extend and strengthen export controls.

"Fourth. To extend authority to allocate transportation facilities and equipment.

"Fifth. To authorize measures which will induce the marketing of livestock and poultry at weights and grades that represent the most efficient utilization of grain.

"Sixth. To enable the Department of Agriculture to expand its program of encouraging conservation practices in this country, and to authorize measures designed to increase the production of foods in foreign countries.

"Seventh. To authorize allocation and inventory control of scarce commodities which basically affect the cost of living or industrial production.

"Eighth. To extend and strengthen rent control.

"Ninth. To authorize consumer rationing on products in short supply which basically affect the cost of living.

"Tenth. To authorize price ceilings on products in short supply which basically affect the cost of living or industrial production, and to authorize such wage ceilings as are essential to maintain the necessary price ceilings."

(b) Recommendations and observations of W. Averell Harriman, Secretary of Commerce, made before the House Committee on Banking and Currency, December 1, 1947:

"I share the conviction that * * * [installment credit controls] should be promptly reenacted.

* * * * *

"My second proposal relates to the extension of authority to allocate transportation facilities and equipment. * * *

"I * * * recommend that these powers be continued.

* * * * *

"* * * Export controls have indirectly assisted in the control of inflation.

* * * * *

"Adequate authority to carry out restricted priority, limitation on use, and inventory controls is necessary.

* * * * *

"Priority powers are required chiefly in order to have the legal right to direct materials to certain end uses which are determined to be critical; for meeting our own urgent needs through increasing industrial production in critical industries; to prevent break-downs in domestic production of short supply materials and products; and to combat inflation, as well as to carry out our foreign policy.

"* * * Authority to control inventories * * * would help to prevent speculative hoarding. * * *

"Further action must be considered which would authorize consumer rationing on products in short supply which basically affect the cost of living, the imposition of maximum prices on products in short supply which basically affect the cost of living or industrial production, and the establishment of such wage ceilings as are essential to maintain the necessary price ceilings.

"* * * I believe that it is possible now * * * to limit controls to those items * * * such as food, fuel, clothing, and shelter, and to those key areas in industrial production where a price rise would have ramified effects on the general level of prices.

* * * * *

"It may well be that a program of stabilizing the cost of living will have to include the equitable distribution of the available supply of certain essential items for personal consumption by a program of consumer rationing. This authority should also be granted now. * * *

"The authority to set ceiling prices in fields of critical importance must include authority to limit wage increases in those industries which would require increases in ceiling prices.

* * * * *

"Rationing of the necessities which are in short supply on an equitable basis and at a fair price taken under authority granted by the representatives of the people in Congress, is the democratic way of dealing with an emergency."

(c) Recommendations of Clinton P. Anderson, Secretary of Agriculture, before the House Committee on Banking and Currency, November 26, 1947:

"Authority for price control and rationing would be good insurance (in our efforts to provide foreign aid).

* * * * *

"In order that we may be prepared for any emergency * * * it would be necessary to have authority not only for controlling exports but for limiting inventories and directing use of grain domestically through the most essential channels. Authority for allocating the use of storage and transportation facilities and distribution of farm machinery and fertilizer would also be necessary."

(d) John Snyder, Secretary of the Treasury, before the House Banking and Currency Committee, November 25, 1947:

"I am in favor of the restoration of those (consumer credit) controls."

(e) Marriner Eccles, Chairman of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, before the Joint Committee on the Economic Report, November 25, 1947:

"We recommend * * * that all commercial banks be required * * * to hold some percentage of their demand and time deposits, in addition to present reserves, in a special reserve in the form either of short-term Government securities or cash, cash items, interbank balances, or balances with Federal Reserve banks."

(f) Lewis B. Schwellenbach, Secretary of Labor, before the House Committee on Banking and Currency, December 2, 1947:

"The pressure for a third round of wage increases can be offset in one way only: By prompt and firm action to reduce the cost of living, and particularly the cost of food, and to restrain further increases in other prices. It is essential that we check the rise in rents and that we bring down the price of common foods. The President's program is designed to provide the means for doing this.

* * * * *

"The urgency of the situation * * * is such that I believe authority should be granted to take involuntary action [as distinguished from voluntary] if such controls should be necessary."

(g) RALPH FLANDERS, United States Senator from Vermont, according to the New York Sun of December 4, "called for a 'real' voluntary meat-rationing program and said any American who refused to abide by it ought to be branded 'a social menace.' "

III. THE BUFFETT ANALYSIS AND PROPOSAL, AND THE LESSONS OF THE PAST

Said HOWARD BUFFETT, Representative from Nebraska, in an address in Congress, November 28, 1947, on the subject Inflation Will Continue Until the American Citizen Can Again Secure Gold Coin:

"Mr. Speaker, Congress has been in special session for 2 weeks. During that time we have had a number of reports about conditions in Europe and Asia. At the risk of interrupting this travelogue series, I am going to discuss briefly the most talked about problem on the main streets of America—the rising cost of living.

"I must concede that the problem of inflation in America has not the emotional appeal of current foreign events.

"It is hard to dramatize the losses suffered by the thrifty and frugal people of America, who have seen their dollar savings more than cut in two in purchasing power.

"Inflation is involved problem

"But one does not have to be an expert nor a prophet to foresee the eventual disaster if this money deterioration continues. Yet I must confess that I speak on this problem with some reluctance.

"For over 14 years the endeavor to clearly comprehend and understand the intricacies of inflation and money deterioration has held first place in my life. Yet, after those years of study, I still often find myself temporarily following one of the countless blind alleys that so easily confuse the student of this problem.

"Copernicus, the great scientist, once pictured the difficulty that confronts us on inflation.

"In 1526 King Sigismund of Poland called in Copernicus to discover what was the matter with Poland and what might be done about it.

"The king did not pretend to be an economist. But he sensed that there might be some connection between the economic distress of his people and his dilution of the money by frequent coin clipping.

"Copernicus made a study and opened his report with those observations:

"'Among the innumerable calamities which ordinarily cause the downfall of the kingdoms, principalities, and republics, there are four, which according to my opinion, are the most dangerous ones:

"'1. Discord.

"'2. Great mortality.

"'3. Sterility of the soil.

"'4. Deterioration of money.'

"Copernicus continued:

"'The evidence of the first three is so great that nobody dares ignore them. But as regards the fourth—

"Concerning the deterioration of money—

"'* * * very few * * * take any interest in it. This is because it ruins the state not at once but by small degrees, by an action which is in a certain sense hidden.'

"Copernicus was certainly right. The deterioration of money is a hidden and long-drawn-out process.

"People are aroused about prices

"But while the processes of currency deterioration may be involved and difficult to understand, the consequences are not.

"The rising prices that portray money deterioration are painfully apparent today to the American people. A spiraling cost of living is no longer a theoretical danger discussed only by Republicans and economists. Not any more. It is a fact.

"Already it has almost certainly become a decisive factor in American political affairs. Developments in this field will influence and probably determine the outcome of 1948 elections.

"And so it was not surprising that the rising cost of living, called the march of inflation by the President, is one of the two reasons why he called a special session.

"Exports currently fuel inflation fires

"No one but the most zealous New Deal partisan will now quarrel with the fact that gigantic foreign exports are the immediate cause of most spiraling prices. Exceptional rises have taken place mostly in products and materials directly affected by this export boom.

"And so it requires no special ability to foresee that if this outpouring continues, the momentum of rising prices will continue. Especially is this true if public resistance to hand-outs and high prices takes the form of lowered productivity. That possibility is something to think about.

"But today I want to get at the root of this problem, the underlying basic cause of the dilution in the purchasing power of the American dollar. What is causing the continuous decline in the purchasing power of the American dollar, and how can it be cured? This is the real problem. On its sound solution rests the future of America, with all that America means to the rest of the world.

"Money deterioration started in 1933

"Mr. Speaker, the seeds for the present harvest of inflation were planted in 1933. At that time we changed from a sound currency redeemable in gold on demand to a money system domestically tied to the printing press and internationally to gold.

"This mongrel or mixed-breed money system is not too different from the paper-money system used in Russia and other totalitarian states. Here, as in Russia, the plain citizen cannot own gold. That basic freedom is verboten in both lands.

"I am not expert enough to expound the technicalities of the abandonment of the gold-coin standard. And the technical aspects do not concern us at this moment. The important fact is that we departed from sound money redeemable on demand in gold, and today have a managed system of printing-press currency.

"When this revolution in our money system took place, the immediate surface effects on our currency were not disturbing. Public faith in our money system rested on a long heritage of sound money redeemable in gold.

"We had been on a gold-coin standard from 1837 until 1933, except for a lapse caused by the Civil War. This century-long record of stability coupled with the seeming security which Treasury-owned gold stocks created, served to keep the vast majority of people complacent.

"While the real anchor for a sound currency, gold coins of a fixed weight and fineness freely available upon demand, was gone the loss seemed of little importance.

"Evils of printing-press money not quickly discovered

"There was no significant immediate effect on the domestic purchasing power of the dollar. The vigorous alarms sounded by those who knew the perils of paper money were dismissed as unimportant. Besides these alarms were easily drowned out by administration ballyhoo sugar-coating the change.

"And so the orgy of reckless public spending using printing-press money that got under way promptly met with no effective resistance. Deficit spending running into the billions brought a general feeling of prosperity not unlike that of the greenhorn who drifted into a brokerage office and deposited $1,000 to speculate. With unusual luck he soon had a $500 paper profit, whereupon he exclaimed, 'How long has this been going on? Why did not somebody tell me about this easy money sooner?'

"Our fiat money was similarly intoxicating in its early stages, as demonstrated by the 1936 elections.

"This reckless spending spree continued unabated until the outbreak of war.

"A 1939 Treasury sales letter

"Early in 1939 a form letter from the Secretary of the Treasury came to our house. Sensing that the day would come when the contents of that letter might prove interesting, I filed it away in my inflation file started in 1933.

"What has happened on the inflation front since 1939 can perhaps best be illustrated by reading to you from that letter, which I now hold in my hand.

"It is headed 'The Secretary of the Treasury.' It is dated March 22, 1939. It is signed by Henry Morgenthau.

"It starts out like this:

"'DEAR MRS. BUFFETT: I appreciate the cordial interest shown and the response given to my previous letters concerning United States savings bonds. The amount sold has already passed the $2,000,000,000 mark in maturity value, and the sale of these securities is increasing.'

"Then on page 2, it says:

"'This makes them ideally suitable for many objectives for which individuals and families lay aside money, such things as the education of children, the purchase of a home, the creation of a retirement fund, and so on.'

"Included with this letter was an attractive booklet setting out various alleged benefits that would accrue to the purchaser of the bonds. On the cover is this claim, 'A practical way to establish financial independence.'

"These were the promises and allurements offered the prospective purchaser of savings bonds in 1939. Over one billion one hundred million of maturity value of savings bonds were sold that year to purchasers relying on the soundness of the dollar.

"What has happened to their investment in the 8½ years since the date of Mr. Morgenthau's letter?

"I have a chart here that gives the prices and total cost of a market basket of food in 1939:

"Measured by 1947 food prices, the $1,000 bond of March 1939 has shrunk to $387 in 1947

	Prices in March 1939	Prices in November 1947
2 dozen eggs	$0.35	$1.18
5 pounds chuck roast	.85	2.75
3 pounds Crisco	.47	1.12
1 pound butter	.26	.85
12 pounds flour	.39	1.02
5 pounds sugar	.22	.45
1 pound coffee (8 O'clock)	.14	.39
10 pounds potatoes	.19	.45
2 pounds bread	.15	.22
2 quarts milk	.28	.38
2 cans pork and beans (1 pound each)	.13	.23
2 cans corn (Niblets)	.20	.35
3 pounds picnic ham	.45	1.29
1 head lettuce	.05	.13
1 pint salad dressing	.17	.29
2 cans pears (Del Monte)	.30	.86
1 box Rinso (large package)	.19	.36
1 pound peanut butter	.17	.35
Total	4.96	12.68

"In terms of this typical market basket, it will take in 1947 over $2,500 to buy the groceries that $1,000 would purchase in 1939.

"These foods are as typical a list as I could select. They show the cost of this market basket in Washington was $4.96 on March 23, 1939. That was about the same day that Mr. Morgenthau's sales letter reached our house.

"Last week according to ads in the Washington papers this same market basket of food would have cost $12.68. That is an increase of over 150 percent.

"This means that measured by 1939 prices a 1939 $1,000 savings bond today has a buying power of only $387. This investment, in terms of the amount of food it will buy, has shrunk 60 percent.

"That indicates that the 1939 investor in savings bonds or in insurance, or in any investment calling for fixed repayment in dollars, has lost, in food-buying power, over one-half of his original purchasing power.

"Large-scale debasement has taken place

"Mr. Speaker, this debasement of our money and bonds proves that we have gone far down the road of currency depreciation in America.

"This march toward currency destruction can never be cured by the ideas and plans proposed by the President in his message to Congress. The best of his suggestions are helpful palliatives, while others are simply economic narcotics which might delay an inflationary smash-up but deepen its evil consequences.

"Surely our task is not to try to deaden the pain of the inflationary infection afflicting us, but to find and cure the cause or causes.

"Mr. Speaker, may not the basic cause of our currency deterioration stem out of this fact, that since 1933 the people have no effective brake on Government spending? The issuance of fiat money and bonds payable in printing-press money are subject to no effective control by the people. The tax-paying citizens are no longer able to prevent Government spending from continuing to the point of currency destruction.

"The power of the purse, although technically lodged in the House of Representatives, basically remained in the hands of the people so long as our currency was redeemable in gold coin.

"Political parties will not stop inflationary spending

"The events since VJ-day have demonstrated that neither political party will stop this spending under a fiat-money system. Let me illustrate. Suppose a major party exhibited the integrity to stand firm for economy and against further inflation? It is extremely doubtful if it could maintain its own ranks even temporarily, let alone long enough to effectively prevent further deterioration of our currency.

"Realistically this is the political situation that confronts us so long as our currency is not anchored to free coinage and circulation of gold.

"With printing-press money easily available, the temptation to stay on the slide of currency deterioration inflation is almost irresistible. Take a period of high governmental revenues like the present. The political advantage of prolonging the boom prevents the 'ins' from curtailing expenditures and restraining the rise, except for campaign oratory and indecisive remedies.

"Similarly in times of falling governmental revenues the temptation to meet deficits by printing-press money is even more powerful, not only for the executive departments but for the legislative branch as well.

"Restore gold standard

"And so, Mr. Speaker, bills are being prepared, designed to restore the right of private ownership of gold and to provide for the minting and free circulation of gold coins. I expect to introduce these bills together with the appropriate corollary legislation needed to achieve this constructive goal. It is expected that similar bills will be introduced in the Senate.

"I am convinced that the restoration of the free circulation of gold is the only sound cure for our inflation sickness. It is the only action that will constructively and permanently halt the deterioration of our currency.

"Regimentation will not stop money depreciation

"For his part, the President wants the power to regiment the people in peacetime. He believes he can stabilize our currency by political regulation of natural economic forces.

"I respectfully suggest that if the President would study carefully the history of previous attempts of this kind, his views would change. He would no longer believe that governmental regimentation could stop money deterioration, no matter how well intentioned and skillful the regulating authorities might be. The natural laws of economics, like all natural laws, are not changed by human desire or caprice.

"Many people still nurse the hope that increased production will cure this situation. They forget that production always creates its own purchasing power. If we produce in 1948 one hundred and fifty billions of goods, there will be one hundred and fifty billions of new money-created to buy those goods.

"Also, there is good reason to believe that without the prompt stabilization of our currency, sporadic lags in productivity by some segments of our people will become general. Our industrious people, who have been working hard and saving dollars for the future, are certainly human. They will not continue to do so if they become convinced that the deterioration of such savings will continue indefinitely.

"Somewhere along the line these thrifty and frugal people will decide that depriving themselves of immediate enjoyment by saving dollars is unwise. Then, like the populations of many European lands, these workers will no longer put their trust in an irredeemable paper currency.

"If Congress does not soon effectively deal with the problem, this peril may not be too far away. A mass abandonment of dollar saving habits would be a major calamity, especially as a mass flight from the dollar would almost surely follow.

"The people should have the power to prevent money deterioration

"Mr. Speaker, I do not speak on this subject with the assurance of a complete understanding of all the intricacies of this problem. But I believe I am correct on the fundamentals, which can be summed up as follows:

"Inflation will not end until the people again possess the final power of restraint over Government spending.

"They only possess that restraining power when they can exchange paper currency for gold.

"Until that basic control is again in the hands of the American people where it belongs, we have not put in operation the only final cure to inflation and a deteriorating currency.

"In the meantime, except for intervals, prices are headed higher and higher.

"Until we restore to our people the American heritage of an honest dollar redeemable in gold, instead of the totalitarian device of printing-press currency, our economic, political, and social structure will continue to deteriorate.

"Printing-press money a favorite Communist tactic

"Nicolai Lenin, the first President of Communist Russia, is reported to have declared that the surest way to overturn the existing social order is to debauch the currency. Mr. Roosevelt adopted this economic technique of communism in 1933. We have been using, with clever variations, that totalitarian printing-press money system ever since.

"Unless we repudiate it, that Lenin-favored device in itself will ultimately bring communism to America. Printing-press money is a device that robs and cheats the working and trusting people while the shrewd and well-informed enrich themselves.

"Paper money is an enemy much more to be feared than Soviet military power, real or fancied.

"Since printing-press money has been a decisive device in the political success of the New Deal, it is obvious that any real fight to restore an honest American dollar redeemable in gold must come from the Republican Party.

"And conversely, if we of the Republican Party do not make this fight for the people, the people will have no reason to restore us to power. In this drive for an honest gold dollar, all patriots have a common interest. But without vigorous leadership, little progress is possible.

"Mr. Speaker, until we restore an honest American dollar redeemable in gold, prices are headed higher and higher. Survey, if you will, the shattered and worthless paper currencies of Europe. There you will see the chaos that awaits us in the absence of a restoration of an honest dollar, redeemable in gold on demand.

"Eventually, when the people find that our currency is deteriorating, they will lose their enthusiasm for saving dollars. Many shrewd people have been for years putting their savings into land, jewels, works of art, and real wealth of all kinds. Some day that alarm about the value of our currency will spread to the rank and file. No person is knowingly going to invest in securities that are steadily deteriorating in real value.

* * * * *

"* * * If we allow currency depreciation to continue and to become worse and worse, there will be no nation on earth that could or would provide us with a Marshall plan to prop up the economy of this Nation.

* * * * *

"The people * * * [in Europe] formerly put their money into currency and bonds, but they cannot eat the currency and they cannot eat the bonds and those pieces of paper have little exchange value. The things Europeans are interested in now are meat, potatoes, flour, and the other essentials of life. Their currency in terms of those essentials is largely valueless today, and it is up to us to see that the same currency deterioration does not continue any longer in this country.

"To effectively stop it, we must give back to the citizen the right to transfer the fruits of his labor into gold as a repository of value.

"Without the assurance of sustained value, the saving of money will slow down to a trickle. Yet new savings going into capital goods, as the gentleman from Michigan, FRED L. CRAWFORD, has pointed out, is an absolute necessity in a capitalistic and free enterprise society."

Income-Tax Reduction

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. BERTRAND W. GEARHART

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Speaker, at the request of Senator GEORGE W. MALONE and because of the wide interest in income-tax reduction effected by the legislation enacted by the Eightieth Congress, I submit for the record a summary of the Revenue Act of 1948 for inclusion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

REVENUE ACT OF 1948

Reduces individual income tax rates from 10 to 30 percent, by size of taxable income.

Increases exemptions from $500 to $600.

Provides an additional exemption of $600 to taxpayers and spouses if they are over 65.

Provides an additional exemption of $600 to taxpayers and spouses if they are blind, replacing the present $500 deduction for blindness.

Allows husbands and wives who file joint returns to compute the tax on half their combined incomes and multiply by two.

Allows single persons and married couples filing joint returns to take optional standard deductions of 10 percent of adjusted gross income up to a maximum deduction of $1,000 (previously $500).

Raises the maximum deduction for medical expenses (allowed at the rate of $1,250 for each personal and dependent exemption) from $2,500 to $5,000 in the case of married couples filing joint returns.

Limits estate tax on community property to a tax on the interest of the deceased.

Exempts from estate tax common law property passing in fee to the spouse of the deceased up to a maximum of half of the common-law property in the adjusted gross estate.

Limits gift tax on community property to a tax on the interest of the grantor.

Computes gift tax on gifts of common law property to a spouse on the basis of half the value of such property.

Taxes gifts by one spouse to a third party as though the gifts were made one-half by each spouse, provided both spouses agree to such tax treatment for all their gifts during the calendar year.

Makes appropriate changes in the provisions for the alternative Supplement T tax and in the provisions for withholding of tax from wages.

Gift tax provisions are applicable to gifts made after date of enactment. Estate tax provisions are applicable to estates of persons dying after date of enactment. Income tax provisions are, in general, applicable for taxable years beginning after December 31, 1947. For fiscal years falling partly in 1947 and partly in 1948, income tax provisions are generally applicable in proportion to the share of the fiscal year which falls in 1948. Withholding tax changes are applicable to wages paid on or after April 1, 1948.

Representative Clare Hoffman, of Michigan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE H. BENDER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, in the work of the House Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, the leadership of the gentleman from Michigan, Representative CLARE HOFFMAN, as chairman of the full committee, has been an outstanding achievement. In the direction of the many subjects undertaken for investigation, in the conduct of public hearings, and in the development of a plan of action for the guidance of the subcommittees appointed by the larger group, the gentleman from Michigan, Representative HOFFMAN, has won the respect and confidence of official Washington. He has demonstrated a determination to be absolutely fair, to be unfailingly courteous, but, above all else, to be completely thorough.

It is already apparent that the work of this committee will throw light on many of the shadowy places which went almost entirely unobserved in the Nation's preoccupation with the major task of winning the war. The magnitude of the task assumed by Representative HOFFMAN and his committee is already being revealed by the early findings of the committee.

Whatever may be the ultimate conclusions reached by the Hoffman committee, observers are already agreed that they will hold up against any challenge, because the committee chairman has painstakingly, completely, and wisely established standards which assure accuracy, honesty, and freedom from bias.

The achievements recorded by this committee are in large part due to the energy of Congressman HOFFMAN. He is responsible for guiding through the House the resolutions which defeated two of the President's reorganization plans which would have meant greater authority and more spending for bureaucrats. He is responsible for the action of the Federal Parole Board in compelling the return of five Chicago criminals who had been paroled after serving only their minimum terms in spite of their conviction of conspiracy to extort more than a million dollars from the motion-picture industry.

As a result of Congressman HOFFMAN'S work, certain Democratic members of his committee have supported his efforts and seconded his program.

Representative HOFFMAN'S constituency has the satisfaction of knowing that their Representative in Congress has once again proven himself worthy of their confidence and their wholehearted support.

Flood Control at the Source

OF

HON. WILLIAM LEMKE

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. LEMKE. Mr. Speaker, flood control and water conservation are two of the greatest problems confronting the American people. There are many suggested solutions. One solution is building large dams and large storage basins. These storage basins have one advantage, and that is furnishing electrical energy the year around. They also have many disadvantages such as flooding fertile lands and covering valuable coal and mineral lands.

While the electrical energy resulting from these large storage basins can be distributed to the surrounding communities, yet the water may not be so accessible to all. There are those who feel that a happy solution would be a combination of the two. A large number of small dams with here and there a large one.

In order to bring these matters before the public for intelligent consideration, I include in my extension an article by Ernest C. Burlbaw:

FLOOD CONTROL AT THE SOURCE

(By Ernest C. Burlbaw)

Before going into the problem of flood control, it is desirable to determine just what we wish to accomplish.

To do this, one need only look at the following conditions resulting from the average flood:

1. A large amount of fertile land is inundated and potentially valuable crops are destroyed.

2. Many persons living along the rivers are forced to flee from their homes, and a large sum of money must be spent to insure their health and safety during their exile and after their return home.

3. Valuable business and real property is destroyed or damaged.

4. Normal business upon or along the waterway is disrupted and travel is curtailed or restricted.

To eliminate, insofar as is possible, the above conditions must be the real aim of flood control. Anything short of that is only partial control, and any other consideration, such as the generation of hydroelectric power should be proposed on its own merits.

Essentially, then, we may define flood control as the storage of excess precipitation, and its subsequent release at such time and in such manner as to prevent the occurrence of any of the conditions listed above.

These aims of flood control may be attained only through the proper location of the storage reservoirs. For example a dam placed at the mouth of the Missouri River might benefit that area lower down on the Mississippi, but it would certainly bring about the very conditions which we wish to eliminate along the Missouri Valley above the dam.

Since the volume of water flowing down the Missouri River is so great that it causes flood conditions over a period of weeks, it is self-evident that it will be impossible to store this water in the Missouri Valley proper without inundating approximately the entire valley land which would have to be purchased by the Government. Far from solving the problem this would remove thousands of acres of fertile soil from productive use. In the long run it would be as logical for the Government to buy this land and allow it to remain idle thus saving the cost of the dams.

In another instance, dams placed at the mouth of the large tributaries would control the floods in the Missouri Valley proper and would benefit the people in that area, but they would cause flood conditions behind the dams on the large tributaries.

From these two examples it can be seen that numerous smaller dams placed farther up the tributaries will benefit more people by establishing flood control over a greater area and without covering so much valuable and productive land.

To attain all the aims of the flood-control program throughout the area the dams must be placed sufficiently far up the rivers that the water stored by them will not cause inconvenience or damage to property, or the loss of fertile land through inundation.

This will require a large number of small dams, strategically located, as near the source of rainfall as possible. These dams must be constructed to store the excess precipitation that normally runs off of a given section of land. With the dams properly located throughout the drainage area the flow of water in the rivers will be under close control.

Two methods are proposed for determining the storage capacity of the dams placed in a given area.

1. Since it is evident that the amount of run-off water will not be the same for different types of soil and conditions of terrain, it must first be determined how much run-off is to be expected. In order to do this test plots are selected to represent the various soil and terrain combinations peculiar to the area, i. e., sandy, clay, loam, or rocky soil located in flat, rolling, and hilly country. Then the precipitation and run-off are measured on each plot for a period of 1 year, and calculation is made of the percentage of rainfall that ran off during the flood season.

Applying this run-off data, in terms of percentage of rainfall, to the Weather Bureau precipitation records for previous years, it is possible to determine the amount of water that can be expected to run off 1 acre of each of the representative plots during an average year and during the flood season of an average or wet year.

As an example, a 40-acre plot with 4 inches of precipitation during floodtime and 75 percent run-off will require the storage of 3 inches over the 40 acres, 120 inches over 1 acre, or 10 feet over 1 acre. In other words, a reservoir with average depth of 10 feet and covering an area of 1 acre will be required.

Having determined the data for the plots, the area to be considered is divided into drainage areas of convenient size. The land is then gone over section by section and cataloged according to type and expected run-off per acre.

Locations of dam sites will then be selected to cover the drainage area most efficiently and with the least inundation of fertile land. The size of the reservoir will be determined by the amount of land being drained and the run-off data. In some instances one or more reservoirs may be located in an area of a few square miles, especially in mountainous country. In flat table lands it will be necessary to locate the reservoirs around the border of the flat area. By taking advantage of the marginal land containing ravines, canyons, etc., and locating the dams as near the source as possible it will be possible to retain all the fertile valley land for productive use, and the major rivers would not be obstructed.

2. This method is the opposite of method 1 in the manner of approach. Taking into consideration the major rivers of the drainage area, we travel upstream on each river or tributary until a point is reached at which the daily flow of water may be accurately measured. A survey is then made of the land drained by this stream and records are kept for one year of the precipitation over the area and of the daily flow of water. From this data calculations are made to determine the amount of run-off during the year and during the flood season.

Comparison of the precipitation data for the test year with that of previous years will indicate the expected run-off for an average year and for the flood season of the average or wet year.

With these figures, showing the amount of water to be stored and the area to be drained, the reservoir capacity per section of land can be determined and the dam sites can be located in the same manner as in method 1.

This second method lends itself quite readily to a test case on any river taken at random from a given area under consideration.

Having located the dam sites and determined the amount of water to be stored, the dams are constructed, usually of earth fill with concrete core if necessary. A normal flow outlet is arranged to permit release of the stored water at a definite rate of flow throughout the summer and fall months. The dam design will be such as to retain a quantity of water for emergency use in the area in case of an exceptionally dry season.

Because of the regulation of the daily flow from each dam the brooks, creeks, and rivers will be maintained at a relatively normal level throughout the year rather than becoming quite low or dry during the hot, dry weather. In many instances this daily flow may be used by the farmers to effect some degree of irrigation or to insure water for livestock during the summer. This benefit will be an added incentive for full participation in the program by the landowners.

Where river transportation is to be considered, the larger rivers will benefit directly from this normal flow.

If it should be considered desirable to construct hydroelectric plants on the larger tributaries, this equalized flow of water would be a direct advantage, allowing operation with much less storage capacity than under present conditions.

Meet the Press

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL E. MUNDT

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include herein the transcript of a radio interview broadcast by the Mutual Broadcasting System on August 6, 1948.

The transcript follows:

MEET THE PRESS

ANNOUNCER. From Washington, D. C., news center of the world, Mutual brings you the most revealing half-hour in radio, Meet the Press, America's press conference of the air.

We invite you to listen to an unrehearsed and spontaneous press conference as four of the country's ace reporters fire questions at Congressman KARL MUNDT, acting chairman of the Committee on Un-American Activities, whose investigation developed a sensational picture of Communist influence in high Government circles.

Each week, Mutual presents Meet the Press in cooperation with the editors of The American Mercury, one of America's most fearless, outspoken, and stimulating magazines. Our press conference will begin in just a moment.

The congressional investigation of Communists brought the American people up to a sudden start. As the story unfolded before the House Committee on Un-American Activities and the Senate investigating subcommittee, the woods seemed to be seething with Communists. Names were mentioned by ex-Communist witnesses that shocked the Nation. People involved in policy making on the highest level were accused of furnishing important information to men and women who passed it on to the Soviet Union. The Communists, it was claimed, had pipe lines to virtually every important Government office.

Is all this the fantasy of someone's vivid imagination? Is all this just political horse play? The President gave one answer yesterday. He said the investigations were a Republican red herring designed to detract public attention from congressional failure to act in his program to stop inflation. He declared that the FBI and grand jury have all the information now being revealed.

Congressman MUNDT insisted that his committee had reason to believe that a Soviet spy-ring is operating at this very moment in Washington.

The American people are puzzled by what has been happening. They want to know the truth. Have our elected officials been careless or venal or stupid? Or have they been diligent and is all this "old stuff" to those in authority and already properly taken care of?

Here to answer many of the questions you would ask is Congressman KARL MUNDT, acting chairman of the Un-American Activities Committee, and, now, here is the well-known Washington editor of Newsweek magazine, Ernest Lindley, substituting for Albert Warner, who is on vacation, to welcome Congressman MUNDT and the gentlemen of the press.

Mr. LINDLEY. Welcome, everybody, to another weekly news conference. We had expected to have Miss Elizabeth Bentley, a chief witness in the current investigations of Communist activities, with us here tonight, but, then, the House Un-American Activities Committee said it could not guarantee that she could be in Washington tonight. We hope to put her on the witness stand at Meet the Press next Friday. I don't quite dare call the gentleman who's been presiding over one of these inquiries a substitute for the so-called spy queen, but we're glad to have him, the acting chairman of the Un-American Activities Committee, Representative KARL E. MUNDT, Republican, of South Dakota.

Mr. MUNDT is winding up his fifth and probably his last term as a Congressman. If he comes back in January, as most of us expect him to, it'll be as United States Senator from South Dakota. In his years at the House, Mr. MUNDT has made an intensive study of communism and Communist tactics both here and abroad. He was the co-author of the Mundt-Nixon bill to curb communism which was before Congress last spring and during the last 2 weeks he has been presiding over one of the most sensational investigations of recent years.

Seated at the press table are Mae Craig, of the Portland (Maine) Press-Herald; Nelson Frank, of the New York World-Telegram; Lawrence Spivak, of the American Mercury; and Joseph A. Loftus, of the New York Times.

Now, who has the first question to put to Mr. MUNDT? Mrs. Craig.

Mrs. CRAIG. Well, Congressman, President Truman said at his press conference yesterday that this Communist spy ring in Washington exists only in your mind.

Mr. MUNDT. Yes; I read that, Mrs. Craig, and I also read that he said it was an attempt by the Republicans to draw a red herring across the activities of the special session of Congress. I think the best answer to that might be that at no time since we have had the Un-American Activities Committee in session during this short session of Congress has there been a majority of Republicans at the committee table. Part of the time we had four Democrats and three Republicans. Most of the time, three Democrats and three Republicans, and all of our decisions and all of our actions so far have been unanimous, so if it's a figmentation of anybody's mind, it's the figment of imagination of six Members of Congress, not one, and three Republicans and three Democrats, and I'm very much afraid that the President of the United States is going to have to eat that statement word by word and it will be tougher than Missouri knew before he gets done and it may be by the end of next week.

Mrs. CRAIG. Well, Congressman, let's get back to Miss Bentley. I think there's a tremendous amount of interest in her. You said you couldn't guarantee her getting here tonight. Where is she?

Mr. MUNDT. Because we can't guarantee to get her here, we can't guarantee to tell you where she is, either, because she is needed from time to time during these hearings to go places to identify certain witnesses being brought into the hearings.

Mr. SPIVAK. Mr. MUNDT, the President also said that your hearings are serving no useful purpose. Now, what purpose do you think the hearings are serving?

Mr. MUNDT. One very useful purpose up to now is to take from the employment of the Commerce Department a young man who was implicated in this testimony and will admit every aspect of the testimony except the type of evidence that he was delivering to Miss Bentley. He says, "I admit that I know Miss Bentley. I admit that I delivered to her many different items of Government information. I admit that I delivered those items to her in the darkness of the night in a park where nobody could see it. I admit that I gave her money, but the money I gave her was not to be used as she said she used it, and I am surprised that she made the use of the information that she said she did," and he also said, "I didn't consider the information of very great importance."

Mr. SPIVAK. Well, Mr. MUNDT, what useful purpose, to answer directly.

Mr. MUNDT. He has been removed by the Commerce Department from his job since these hearings began.

Mr. SPIVAK. Well, are they since the hearings began? Wasn't he relieved of his job some weeks ago?

Mr. MUNDT. No. He was on a vacation at the time the hearings began and was on a leave of absence and has been removed officially since the hearings began.

Mr. LOFTUS. Congressman, hasn't the FBI had 3 years to investigate Remington and haven't they failed to prove anything against them? Why do you take up cases that the FBI has failed at?

Mr. MUNDT. We are not at all critical of the FBI. In its aspects, the FBI can investigate a case and complete its investigations and provide the evidence but it then ceases to have any authority and it goes over to the Department of Justice to act upon it. After the FBI has completed its investigation, we have frequently found that the Department of Justice has failed to act.

Mr. LOFTUS. Well, that's a red herring, Congressman. I didn't ask you to be critical of the FBI. I asked you why you take cases that they have failed to prove after 3 years of trying.

Mr. MUNDT. We don't believe the FBI has failed to prove the case. We feel that action has failed to come from the Attorney General's Office, not from the FBI.

Mr. FRANK. Well, Congressman, are you going to ask J. Edgar Hoover to come in here and tell you what he knows about the spy rings?

Mr. MUNDT. We would like to have J. Edgar Hoover come in and several other witnesses but President Truman has issued an iron curtain between the White House and Congress and forbids by Executive order any member of the Cabinet, any member of his official family, any employee of Government, either to give us information or let us see the official records.

Mrs. CRAIG. Well, Congressman, since all the Communists I've ever heard before your committees admit that they lie whenever they think it's to guard them in the Communist cause, why do you believe any of them now?

Mr. MUNDT. Well.——

Mrs. CRAIG. Whether reformed or not?

Mr. MUNDT. There's a great difference, I think, between a reformed Communist and a Communist. Certainly, the Communists do lie to non-Communists. I think Communists tell the truth to one another, frequently because they are afraid of the consequences of falsehood, but when a Communist has reformed, as in the instance of Miss Bentley, as in the instance of Mr. Chambers, as in the instance of a great number of other former Communists who have testified before our committee and before the FBI, we have reason to believe that along with that reformation which took them away from communism is a reformation which permits them to tell the truth.

Mr. SPIVAK. Mr. MUNDT, is it true that the Department of Justice tried to have the congressional investigation called off? Is that true?

Mr. MUNDT. I can say that the Department of Justice did not contact me or use any influence upon me to call it off. Whether they did anything with the Senate committee or not, I do not know.

Mr. SPIVAK. Now, what about the House committee? Did they try to have—you, as acting chairman, should know—did the Department of Justice, as Congressman NIXON is reputed to have charged, try to call the congressional investigation off?

Mr. MUNDT. Not in contacting me, and, insofar as I know, they did not use that influence on the House.

Mr. SPIVAK. You don't know, then, why that particular charge was made, as was reported. * * *

Mr. MUNDT. No; I didn't even happen to see that charge made.

Mr. LOFTUS. Congressman, you got the Silvermaster Civil Service Commission reports through the iron curtain. How did you do that?

Mr. MUNDT. We got that before President Truman issued the iron curtain order and we feel that one reason he did issue it was because we got the Silvermaster file.

Mr. LOFTUS. The Silvermaster file confirmed Miss Bentley's testimony.

Mr. MUNDT. One hundred percent.

Mr. LOFTUS. Did you try to get the civil-service file on Mr. Hiss?

Mr. MUNDT. We tried to get the civil-service file on several of the other witnesses, but before we got around to writing our official letters, Senator FERGUSON had tried to get the official file on Mr. Remington.

Mr. LOFTUS. Well, you didn't try to get the civil-service file on Mr. Hiss.

Mr. MUNDT. Well, let me explain why. Because before we had an opportunity to write the letter on Mr. Hiss, President Truman stated that he would not let any of these files be given to any of the congressional committees. We would love to have the civil-service file on Mr. Hiss.

Mr. LOFTUS. Isn't it very possible that the civil-service file would not confirm Miss Bentley's testimony in his case?

Mr. MUNDT. Well, I don't want to either condemn or commend Mr. Hiss until I can find what is behind the amazing contradiction in the testimony between Mr. Hiss and the senior editor of Time magazine, Mr. Chambers. They are diametrically 100 percent opposed and in 10 years of history, may I say, of the Un-American Activities Committee, this is the first time there has been such an amazing head-on conflict of testimony between two witnesses who, on the face of it, might be considered to be equally reputable.

Mr. LINDLEY. Mr. MUNDT, if, as Mr. Chambers testified, he and Alger Hiss were old friends, don't you think it probable that somebody's alive who saw them together at some time or another?

Mr. MUNDT. I would think so, Mr. Lindley, and in all events we have put part of our investigative staff on the trail of the testimony given both by Mr. Chambers and Mr. Hiss in an effort to substantiate the testimony of both wherever they can and to refute it wherever they can.

Mr. LINDLEY. If you are unable to find anybody who had ever seen the two together, would you be inclined to credit Mr. Hiss' testimony or Mr. Chambers' testimony to their relationship?

Mr. MUNDT. If we could find no further evidence at all, I'd be inclined to let the testimony stand on its own bottom and let the American public make up its mind.

Mr. LINDLEY. But wouldn't you, as chairman of the committee who has been studying this thing, be under obligation to indicate which one you thought was telling the truth?

Mr. MUNDT. I don't think so.

Mrs. CRAIG. Mr. Mundt, several people, including Mrs. Roosevelt and Loft and Currie, have called Miss Bentley a neurotic. Now, Mr. Silvermaster went a little further. He said that she was a neurotic liar. Do you know whether she's ever been in a mental institution?

Mr. MUNDT. To my knowledge, she has never been in a mental institution and the only people I have ever heard claim that she has been are the editors of the Communist Daily Worker and part of the smear brigade of the Communist Party.

Mr. FRANK. I wonder if I couldn't answer that. The FBI worked with her for a year and a half. They checked on that quite well.

Mr. MUNDT. She also testified before the grand jury in New York at the behest of Secretary—or Attorney General Tom Clark, and I doubt whether they would use a neurotic or a person who was recently a refugee from a mental institution. I think that's purely one of the numerous falsehoods in the smear tactics of the Communist Party.

Mr. LINDLEY. Mr. Frank, technically, you are out of order, but we're glad to have your contribution of fact.

Mrs. CRAIG. Congressman, I asked you that about Miss Bentley in a mental institution because I have heard it several times in the last few days.

Mr. MUNDT. I have, too, and as far as I've been able to chase it, it's all come from the same Communist source. As you know, Miss—Mrs. Craig, once a rumor has started, you can hear it from several sources, even though it originates from a single source.

Mr. LINDLEY. Do you know whether Mr. Chambers was ever in a mental institution?

Mr. MUNDT. I've never heard that. I believe that's sly, adverse Newsweek publicity. I don't believe. * * * [Laughter].

Mr. LINDLEY. Not so intended. I was told that he had been today and I want the facts.

Mr. MUNDT. If you were, I imagine it came from some Communist smear panel.

Mr. SPIVAK. Well, Mr. MUNDT, I think you suggested a moment ago that some members of your committee at least felt that the Department of Justice hadn't done all it should have done in placing the information where it would do the most good. Now, isn't it true, however, that it was Attorney General Clark in his office that placed the evidence before the grand jury?

Mr. MUNDT. That's correct, Mr. Spivak, but neither you nor I nor the very frequently misled and misguided and misinformed American public know in what manner this information was placed before the grand jury, nor what, if any kind, of indictments were asked for or what use was made of it. It is true that after the FBI had built up this great pyramided evidence about these Communists' espionage activities, a grand jury was called in New York, and testimony has been held and, of course, the grand jury has not yet adjourned, and we can't guess what they are going to do in connection with that evidence.

Mr. SPIVAK. Well, isn't it true, however, that 12 members of the Communist Party were indicted as a result of the evidence placed before that grand jury?

Mr. MUNDT. That's correct.

Mr. SPIVAK. Do you mean that there are some grand juries you note some details about who have cases and action on them?

Mr. MUNDT. Yes. We know that the 12 Communists who were indicted by this New York grand jury who heard the testimony of Miss Bentley and heard the testimony of some of the other witnesses who have been and will be called before our jury.

Mr. FRANK. Oh, I thought you criticized the Department of Justice for the lack of information about the way they presented the case.

Mr. MUNDT. I criticized them for the lethargy. They didn't even call the grand jury into session in New York until very recently and, as far as I have been able to discover, have not been able to get any indictments up there except those 12.

Mr. FRANK. Congressman, do you believe that the New York grand jury was kept going so long for political reasons?

Mr. MUNDT. I've heard that rumored, I am sure, from authority which I could substantiate better than the authority quoted by my good friend Ernest a few minutes ago. Whether it's true or not, I don't know.

Mrs. CRAIG. Congressman, you tried during the regular session to get through an anti-Communist bill and failed in the Senate. Do you think that you've got law enough now to get them, if it's tried out in the fall?

Mr. MUNDT. Positively not. If one wants to be charitable with the Department of Justice, one might say that a reason they could have difficulty in getting indictments from the grand jury of New York would be the difficulty in finding present laws being violated either by these Communists or these espionage agents. I presume that because we are at war, the Espionage Act might operate, but it's a very tightly drawn act and it might find a loophole because this happened to be espionage between two allies instead of one friendly power and one enemy power.

Mrs. CRAIG. Your candidate, Governor Dewey, however, seemed in the campaign to think we had enough law.

Mr. MUNDT. My candidate, Governor Dewey, endorsed the Republican plank in Philadelphia, which said new laws are necessary and his administration will pass them with a Republican Congress.

Mr. SPIVAK. Mr. MUNDT, your committee has done some fine work and is wide awake. Why are you taking so long to get on to the Bentley case? For example, I think the FBI had her information in 1946. Whittaker Chambers has been around; I think he broke with the party as early as 1939, and most of us knew all about it. How come that your committee took so long before it got on those witnesses?

Mr. MUNDT. The reason for that is that we have been investigating the Bentley case and have had our investigators contacting her for some time but it came out into the open at this particular juncture due to the fact that a committee of another body, the Senate, in pursuing some of its duties in an effort to determine why people in executive departments were working their way into high offices although they were Communists, called on Miss Bentley and at that hearing she said, "I can give you the names of a lot of public officials who are Communists engaged in the espionage ring," and after that, of course, our committee could no longer just operate in the quiet.

Mr. SPIVAK. May I ask you just one more question and this, I think, is fairly important for those of us who believe in the Bill of Rights? Was any attempt made to question a person of Alger Hiss' family in secret before his name was given to the public?

Mr. MUNDT. No, and for this reason. We didn't know that the editor of Time magazine was going to mention Mr. Hiss' name in public. He was not mentioned by Miss Bentley, but he was mentioned by Mr. Chambers, and mentioned apparently quite by accident, not in this prepared statement, but in response to an inquiry as to whether when he left the Communist Party, he endeavored to induce anybody else to quit, and he blandly told the committee and the people there under oath, "Yes, I went to Alger Hiss and visited in his home and urged him to leave and he wanted to leave, it seemed, but with tears in his eyes, he said, 'No, I must stand by the party line'."

Mr. SPIVAK. Well, did you investigate Mr. Whittaker Chambers in secret before you had a public session?

Mr. MUNDT. Only to the extent of determining the pertinency and the relevancy of his testimony, that is, as to the identity of the people about whom he was questioned.

Mr. SPIVAK. One more question—isn't it rather dangerous to our civil rights to permit somebody to spill a great number of important names—they might be Cabinet members and they might be people in very high place—without first finding out whether there was any evidence at all to justify the use of those names?

Mr. MUNDT. I think that would be true, Mr. Spivak, if you were calling in some irresponsible witness, but I don't believe a witness of the standing and type of the senior editor of Time magazine should necessarily be interrogated, as to all the people he expects to talk about before he should be permitted to testify.

Mr. LOFTUS. But you said he introduced the name of Hiss entirely as a surprise to you? Don't you think that reflects on his credibility?

Mr. MUNDT. Not necessarily, because we had heard reports about Mr. Hiss before, we did not know Mr. Chambers was going to talk about Mr. Hiss.

Mr. LOFTUS. Well, couldn't this public conflict of testimony have been avoided if the committee hadn't rushed into these hearings as it did? They started hearings on Saturday, I believe. Wasn't that entirely irregular?

Mr. MUNDT. Irregular on Saturday? Not at all.

Mr. LOFTUS. Well, then, unusual.

Mr. MUNDT. No, no.

Mr. LOFTUS. No previous announcements.

Mr. MUNDT. We've held a great many hearings on Saturday.

Mr. LOFTUS. Didn't the committee suddenly decide to hold hearings because the Senate committee had brought up Miss Bentley?

Mr. MUNDT. I'm glad you mentioned that because, as a matter of fact, we've had Miss Bentley under subpena. Our people had been contacting her—had expected to hold her in executive session on Wednesday. I think it was Thursday or Friday that the Senate committee found that they wanted to have her testify on the Remington case, so we said quite all right, so they had her testify, and we deferred to them, and started ours on a Saturday instead of Wednesday.

Mrs. CRAIG. Mr. MUNDT, do you know whether Miss Bentley has been promised any kind of immunity for her testimony?

Mr. MUNDT. I don't know, except by applying the rule of logic, Mrs. Craig. I presumed that she has turned state's evidence and probably has been given immunity by our enforcement officials for these testimonies she has given. In the words of the late but unlamented Nathan Gregory Silvermaster, certainly, they were self-incriminatory.

Mr. FRANK. Well, Congressman, if you are to register Communists who are on the books, how will that stop that sort of spying that we are reading about?

Mr. MUNDT. I think it would give the complete answer to a case like this, the complete answer, because in the first place it puts the penalty of 5 years in the penitentiary and 5 years in jail for any person who is a Communist, who seeks and secures employment, and it places the same penalty of 5 years in a penitentiary and a $5,000 jail sentence on the bureaucrat or upon the Government official who appoints this particular Communist to a job. Now, we can trace down the people who made these appointments and that would give us an opportunity to enforce the law.

Mr. SPIVAK. Mr. MUNDT, Mr. Stripling, the counsel of your committee, said today that a New Deal Cabinet member was involved in wartime shipments of uranium to Russia. Can you tell us who that New Deal Cabinet member is?

Mr. MUNDT. You are getting off on another aspect of committee investigations, Mr. Spivak, which comes under the direction of Mr. McDOWELL, of Pennsylvania, who is chairman of that subcommittee and is investigating the leakage of secrets of atomic energy and atomic information to the Soviet. It has nothing to do with the particular hearings except that he is in to a certain degree with this espionage ring which was seeking to get atomic secrets. That part of our program has been going on for 12 months and we don't want to get the two hearings mixed together.

Mr. SPIVAK. Is Mr. Stripling his counsel, too, or is he just your counsel?

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Stripling is counsel of the general commitee and is assigned to the McDowell Subcommittee on Atomic Energy.

Mr. SPIVAK. Well, may I follow through for just one moment? Isn't it a mistake to say something like what Mr. Stripling said, that a New Deal Cabinet member was involved? Don't all the former Cabinet members of the New Deal stand accused until his name is mentioned and isn't that the sort of thing we try so hard to avoid under our Bill of Rights and in our democracy?

Mr. MUNDT. I think that could be argued with considerable logic under normal political conditions. But when you face an administration which tells you they will not permit you to look not only at the loyalty files but at the employment files of the Government, sometimes it's necessary to needle these people into giving information which you should be able to get under more normal procedure.

Mr. FRANK. Congressman, do you think that Fascist Italy or Nazi Germany got networks into the Government the same way as Russia seems to have been able to do?

Mr. MUNDT. I think they both tried but because they had not had their Fascist or Nazi organizations organized over here so long or so well, I don't think they succeeded to the extent that the Communists have.

Mr. LOFTUS. Congressman, you think the capitalist system of democracy and free enterprise is the best in the world, don't you?

Mr. MUNDT. Surely.

Mr. LOFTUS. Then, what are you afraid of? Do you think the people will trade it for something?

Mr. MUNDT. I'm afraid that we're going to lose it the way Czechoslovakia lost the same system by the same type of indifference that a lot of Americans show and the failure to face up to the facts of life about Communism and Soviet espionage.

Mrs. CRAIG. Congressman, in your own mind do you feel any explanation, any understanding, of why a woman, like Miss Bentley, of education and training should have turned into a Communist spy against her own country even in wartime?

Mr. MUNDT. It's very difficult. I think her explanation probably is the most persuasive and plausible, and that is that she fell in love with a man who was a Communist.

Mr. LOFTUS. Well, Congressman, if I may follow through there, that doesn't explain why many other native Americans become Communists. How do you explain that?

Mr. MUNDT. It's very difficult, Mr. Loftus. It's hard for me to understand how Earl Browder, born out in Kansas in the great heart of America, became a Communist, but he did, or how he became a Communist, born into a Catholic family, which abominates communism, but he did. I presume that it's because they feel a frustration; it's because they feel a desire to become important and significant, and, consequently, they go into a movement which they think will expedite their access to power or by which they can expedite a social reform of some type. They leave the American system and try some new crackpot line, such as communism or nazism.

Mr. LOFTUS. How about social and economic conditions? Don't you think that's an influence?

Mr. MUNDT. I think in some cases it is, but it's very difficult under those terms to explain the man who has subsidized the Abraham Lincoln School for Communism in New York—a multimillionaire and a Communist.

Mr. LOFTUS. I don't mean that just poor people are in favor of communism. I mean a lot of people with or without money could be influenced by seeing a lot of poverty amidst plenty.

Mr. MUNDT. The only system in the world for eliminating poverty is the American system of free enterprise and the political freedom of the American Constitution.

Mr. LINDLEY. We have time for just one more quick question and answer, Mr. Spivak.

Mr. SPIVAK. Mr. MUNDT, the Communist Party today said that Earl Browder is no longer a Communist. Do you think he is or do you think he isn't? Do you think he is reformed and is your committee planning to call him?

Mr. MUNDT. I think the first day Miss Bentley testified before the Senate committee she explained that perfectly. She said that as soon as you reach a high-enough echelon in Communist activities you are no longer considered a Communist of the card-carrying type. You become a member at large so that you can swear without fear of violating a perjury law you are not a Communist because you enter a new realm where you can become one of the leaders of the party and are not considered either by your associates or outsiders as Communist. Of course, Earl Browder's a Communist. We've had him before our committee. He either refuses to testify entirely or lies by the clock when he's before the committee.

Mr. LINDLEY. Well, Mr. MUNDT, I'd like to ask you what your committee is going to decide Tito is—whether he's still a Communist or not, but we haven't got time for an answer.

Mr. MUNDT. That's a decision a police bureau has to make and not our committee.

Mr. LINDLEY. Well, we've talked over a good deal of ground. There's a lot more that we'd like to know from you just as there are several mysteries, I am sure, you're eager to have your committee clear up during the week and the weeks which follow.

The thanks of the Mutual network go to you, Representative KARL E. MUNDT, of South Dakota, and to my colleagues of the press, Mae Craig, of the Portland (Maine) Press-Herald; Nelson Frank, of the New York World-Telegram; Lawrence Spivak, of the American Mercury; and Joseph A. Loftus, of the New York Times.

Until next week when we hope to have Elizabeth Bentley with us on the witness stand, this is your correspondent, Ernest K. Lindley.

One Year of the Taft-Hartley Law

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE H. BENDER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement:

ONE YEAR OF THE TAFT-HARTLEY LAW

Legislation which is destined to endure is invariably the product of experience. It is enacted in response to some deep need arising from economic or social conditions. The Taft-Hartley law, like the Wagner National Labor Relations Act which it modifies, is clearly the product of a decade of vital experience in the complex field of labor-management-Government relations.

It is now 1 year since the passage of the Taft-Hartley measure over the President's veto by an overwhelming majority of Republicans and Democrats. It is too early to appraise the full extent to which this act will meet the demand for industrial peace which called it into being. Litigation testing one phrase or another of the legislation will be before the courts for some years to come, but certain conclusions are already clear to fair-minded observers.

There has been a decrease in the number of strikes occurring since the passage of the Taft-Hartley bill. Other factors undoubtedly played a part in cutting the 6-month strike record from November 1947 to April 1948 to 1,175 from the figure of 1,969 for the same period 1 year earlier. Nevertheless the influence of the new law in retarding strike calls seems evident to labor analysts.

Two great industries affecting the Nation's economy, coal and shipping, have furnished the testing ground for a major section of the Taft-Hartley Act—the provision of injunctions invoked by the Government to prevent Nation-wide catastrophes. In both instances, industrial chaos has been averted by the use of the new law.

Two other problems which contributed mightly to public sentiment for the Taft-Hartley bill—jurisdictional disputes and secondary boycotts—are no longer the serious problem they were before the act. The unions themselves are handling their jurisdictional disputes intelligently and effectively, keeping these family problems out of the courts. Secondary boycotts are being discouraged by far-sighted union leaders directly because of the inevitable hostility they have aroused.

There is still much ground to be covered before a complete verdict can be rendered on the Taft-Hartley experience. To date, the record of industrial stability secured under the act points strongly to its ultimate acceptance by the general public as an aid to peaceful, around-the-conference-table labor-management relations.

Reclamation Under Democratic Sponsorship

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER K. GRANGER
OF UTAH
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. GRANGER. Mr. Speaker, a look at the record clearly reveals that Democratic administrations have been far more interested than Republican administrations in the development of the West through reclamation of arid and semiarid lands, even though reclamation was given its start by a Republican president, Theodore Roosevelt. Even if appropriations for the last two fiscal years are not counted, the figures show that yearly appropriations and allocations of money made under Democratic administrations have averaged four times as great as funds made available under Republican presidents.

The first reclamation law was passed in 1902. Until the 1914 fiscal year all money for the construction of reclamation projects came from the reclamation fund set up by Congress from income derived from leasing of mineral rights on public lands. Allotments made from the reclamation fund during these early years are taken as the equivalent of appropriations in the comparison which follows. Allotments during the Republican period from 1902 through 1912 amounted to $100,445,789. This includes the fiscal year 1913, since allotments for that year were made in 1912, when President Taft was President. This averaged $9,131,435 a year.

For fiscal year 1914 through 1921, when there were Democratic Presidents, $79,274,359 was appropriated or made available from the reclamation fund. This averaged $9,909,295 a year.

During the lush "boom and bust" days of Republican administration after World War I, there appeared to be no consuming interest in reclamation development, although industrial growth, especially in the East, progressed by leaps and bounds. Despite higher costs for labor and materials, appropriations for reclamation projects from 1921 through 1929 averaged $12,988,449 a year—only 30 percent higher than in the prewar Wilson administration. It was only after depression began to cause widespread unemployment that a somewhat greater interest in reclamation was taken. Total reclamation appropriations for the 12 years of Republican rule amounted to $184,305,990, a yearly average of $15,358,833.

Then the Democrats returned to power, and from fiscal year 1934 through fiscal 1947 sums totaling $998,783,214 were made available for the building and operation of reclamation projects. The average annual appropriation for this period was $71,341,658, although the scarcity of materials and labor during World War II slowed down the construction effort.

This last period of 14 years included not only direct appropriations, but allocations from NIRA, ERA, and PWA funds. The investments made by the Federal Government in this period of Democratic administration exhibit a greater interest in western development than any ever before evidenced.

Thus, in the 23 years since 1902 when a Republican President was in the White House a total of $284,751,779 was made available for reclamation development, whereas in the 22 years of Democratic administration in this period up to and including fiscal 1947, sums amounting to $1,078,057,573 were appropriated or allocated to reclamation. This was almost four times as great as the money allocated under Republican regimes.

In the last two fiscal years appropriations have topped all records—$143,185,924 for 1948 and $246,058,942 for fiscal 1949. During these two years, there has been a Republican majority in Congress, but it can hardly take all of the credit for these sums, because when a Republican House last year cut Reclamation appropriations to a point where it would have meant a discontinuance of many projects, the West rose in anger and demanded a restoration of the funds. The threat to Republican prestige was so great that no effort was made this year to effect a drastic reduction of the program. Reclamation on the eve of this Presidential election has for some reason become popular with the Republicans.

There is still another way of figuring the difference between the Republican and Democratic attitudes toward western developemnt, and that is on the basis of the yearly increases and decreases in the acreages served with irrigation water by the Bureau of Reclamation. This is figured on the basis of crop or calendar years.

In 1906 what was then the Reclamation Service served 20,100 acres with irrigation water. From 1906 through 1912 a net increase of 540,000 acres, or an average of 77,143 acres a year, were brought under water.

From 1913 through 1920 the net increase in acreage served was 1,564,710, an average of 195,589 new acres brought under water each year.

In the 12-year Republican administration, from 1921 through 1932, the net new acreages brought under irrigation totaled 670,570, an average of 55,881 acres.

Then the Democratic administration brought under water a net of 1,761,034 new acres in 15 years, an average of 117,402 acres.

Of the 42-year period covered by these figures, 19 years were under Republican Presidents. During this time, a net increase of 1,210,570 acres under irrigation in the 17 Western States was achieved. This was an average of 63,714 acres a year, or only 59 percent of the 42-year average of 108,007 acres a year. Under the 23 years of Democratic administration, 3,325,744 new acres, net, were brought under water. This was an average of 144,598 a year, or 134 percent of the period average. Expressing it another way, the average acreage brought in during the Democratic years was 2¼ times greater than the yearly average of the Republicans since 1906.

It has often been said that the proof of the pudding is the eating, and so it is that the number of acres placed under irrigation on Utah farms, through construction by the Bureau of Reclamation, tells the real story.

It might be unfair for the Democrats to claim credit for having brought the Strawberry Valley project into production—although they did—although it was authorized under the administration of Theodore Roosevelt in 1905. The Weber River project is another project for which due credit must be given to a Republican regime. When this project was completed in 1933 and the Republicans went out of office there were 67,000 acres of land on that project under irrigation. That made a total of some 106,000 acres of irrigated land served by the Bureau of Reclamation before the present Democratic era. But since 1933 the Democrats have added some 159,000 acres to the land in Utah served with water by reclamation projects; and plans have been made for adding many, many more.

The following chart tells its own story of the number of acres in Utah which have been brought under irrigation through the various projects, and clearly indicates that Utah has faired better under Democratic administrations:

Irrigated acreage on projects served by the Bureau of Reclamation in Utah

	1912 (acres)	1920 (acres)	1932 (acres)	1946 (acres)
Strawberry Valley		35,000	41,185	37,087
Weber River			67,000	90,000
Hyrum				5,605
Moon Lake				55,786
Newton				1,948
Ogden River				15,606
Provo River				37,272
Sanpete				10,318
Scofield				13,884
Total		35,000	108,185	267,548
Increment for period		35,000	73,185	159,363

The record for my own State of Utah is even more striking, when we note that the amounts spent for construction in years of Democratic administration average almost five times amounts spent in Republican administrations.

Altogether, the Republicans have expended on construction of Utah Reclamation projects $4,997,016, while Democratic administrators have expended $23,187,381 up to June 30, 1947. The yearly expenditure for Reclamation projects in Utah during the years of Republican control averaged $217,262, while the yearly average expenditure for construction by the Democrats amounted to $1,053,972. And I can assure you that the work done under Democratic administrators was fully as economically conducted by Reclamation engineers as by Republican administrators.

The Strawberry Valley project authorized in 1905 was the first Reclamation aid brought to Utah by the Federal Government. During the Roosevelt and Taft administrations, $2,271,131 was spent on its construction, and in the Wilson administration it was completed at an additional cost of $1,236,292.

Then, during the 12 years of Republican administration which followed, the only project built was the Weber River project. Its construction cost $2,725,885.

It was during the administration of President Franklin D. Roosevelt that Federal reclamation work in Utah made greatest progress. In June of 1933 both the Ogden River and Provo River projects were authorized. Up to June 30, 1947, $4,403,938 had been spent on the construction of the first of these and $13,211,279 on the second. The Provo River project has brought much needed domestic water supplies to Salt Lake City, as well as supplementary irrigation water to farms, which has entirely changed the standards of living of a great many farmers.

The Hyrum project was authorized in September 1933, and the Sanpete project in November. These cost for construction up to the end of fiscal 1947 the sums of $941,884 and $374,540, respectively.

The Moon Lake project costing for construction $1,600,360 was authorized in November 1935; the Newton project costing $546,393 in July 1939, and the Scofield Dam was authorized in June 1943. To the end of fiscal 1947 it had cost for construction $872,695.

That is the score for Utah up to the end of fiscal 1947.

The year by year score upon which the foregoing statements were based is shown in the tables which follow:

Anyone who knows the history of reclamation is aware that the easy projects—those for which one could get the biggest results for the least expenditure—were naturally the first to be constructed. Even if prices were the same today as they were 40 years ago, the projects being built today would cost more. While improved engineering methods tend to hold down costs somewhat, if we had to construct modern projects with the horses, mules, and manpower used on the earlier projects, most of today's reclamation construction work would be priced out of feasibility. As it is, we can go on building for some time. The Central Utah project, for instance, still lies ahead of us, despite the fact that its cost inevitably will be high.

The costs of reclamation projects today as compared to yesterday are the same as comparative costs in living. So one cannot point an accusing finger at the Bureau of Reclamation and assert that it has been wasteful and extravagant because a project costs more today than it would have cost in 1905, or even 1939. The accusation is very much like charging a man who requires a good deal of food to supply energy for physical labor with extravagance for eating meat at present-day prices. In 1939 one could buy a good round steak for about 35 cents a pound. Today it costs very nearly three times as much. Perhaps a farmer or workingman should not eat meat, but it would hardly be economical for him to fail to obtain sufficient nourishment.

Reclamation projects can be viewed in very much the same manner. Anyone who knows what an ample supply of late season water means in Utah knows that it is the difference between barely getting along and making money. Every year in which a meritorious irrigation project is delayed means the loss of hundreds of thousands of dollars, perhaps millions, to the farmers on that project. It means the difference between raising ordinary row crops and forage, and raising the high-priced specialty crops.

A little reckoning will show that even with the increased prices and the more expensive projects, that the physical volume of work in building dams, canals, and power plants since the Reclamation Service was first established has been almost twice as great during Democratic administrations as the construction accomplished by the Republicans.

Report to the People of Arizona

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RICHARD F. HARLESS
OF ARIZONA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. HARLESS of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, as this special session of the Eightieth Congress draws to a close, I would like to inform the people of Arizona of several of the major issues considered in this Congress which are of special importance to my State. I have been privileged as a Member of Congress to represent the progressive and enthusiastic people of our Nation's "baby State," and it is my desire to keep the people of Arizona informed of my activities in Congress. I fully realize that it would be impossible to make a complete survey of the work of the Eightieth Congress, since many comprehensive laws have been enacted during the past 2 years. However, many matters of particular importance to Arizona and the Southwest are still pending, and it is in this regard that Arizona must exert its efforts both in its State government and in Congress during the Eighty-first Congress. I shall, therefore, dwell on those matters which will affect Arizona during the coming years, both within the State and in its national and international activities.

WATER LEGISLATION

The most important legislative enactments affecting the State of Arizona, which are still pending in Congress are embodied in the central Arizona project. For 25 years, Arizona has struggled to obtain water, which is the very lifeblood of the State. The details of the central Arizona project are well known to the residents of Arizona, who know that the sole purpose of the bills which I and the other Members of the Arizona delegation in Congress have introduced, is to obtain for Arizona its rightful share of the resources of the Colorado River. The Department of the Interior has already approved the proposal, which is self-liquidating, and has submitted it to the Bureau of the Budget with favorable recommendations. In view of the significant importance of the central Arizona project to Arizona and the Southwest, I sincerely hope that it will become a reality in the early part of the Eighty-first Congress. A great part of Arizona's fight for water has involved the active opposition of interests of other States, who have attempted to deprive Arizona of water and to continue to usurp the water from that river. Legislation has been introduced in Congress requiring the Attorney General of the United States to interplead all of the States of the Colorado River Basin into one lawsuit before the United States Supreme Court in order to determine the water rights of each State involved. These are dilatory actions designed to suppress due consideration of Arizona's water problems by the United States Congress. However, the State of Arizona cannot relent in its fight for a rightful share of water. Not only is water of the essence for Arizona, but the development of electrical power is also of extreme importance to the State. The shortage of water and power is acute in Arizona. Due to a lack of power, our industries, mines, and commerce have been forced to curtail their activities, which is a tragic augury for one of the country's fastest-growing areas.

The passage of the Gila-Wellton-Mohawk irrigation project during the first session of the Eightieth Congress was of great importance to Arizona. It was, in fact, the first major irrigation project adopted by Congress, which involved a project irrigated by the waters of the Colorado River, since 1937. That project will mean that some 75,000 acres in Yuma County will have access to irrigation. The central Arizona project will mean that the central portion of our State can be developed and the unusual droughts of that area can be overcome. It is imperative that Arizona, through its State government and through its representatives in the Eighty-first Congress, act immediately and effectively to bring to a successful conclusion its 25-year fight for water and power. It is also essential that the Eighty-first Congress ignore the selfish interests within California who are attempting to block the progress of Arizona and who are thus depriving this country of the results of Arizona's potential development by legislative sabotage of the central Arizona project. We have reached the final stages of our battle for water and power and every effort must be mustered for final victory.

EDUCATION

Through the history of our great country education has been the primary and fundamental cornerstone of the American way of life. It is unfortunate that legislation was left pending by this Congress to lend needed and highly deserved assistance to education. I worked diligently in behalf of Federal aid to education, since I am convinced that it is our duty to every citizen of this country to furnish immediate aid to solve the present-day problems of our educational system. These problems are serious, indeed, and it is incomprehensible that nothing has been done in this Congress to solve them.

The participation of the Federal Government in educational endeavors dates back to the origin of our Government. Through public land allotments and money grants for education since the early days of the Republic, the United States recognized its responsibilities in the educational field. Our constitutional principles are closely related to the education of our citizens, and it is the clear duty of the Federal Government to safeguard our national interests through the promotion of education. Every child in this country should have an equal opportunity to learn. At present, due to differences in the wealth of different States, the opportunity to learn is unequal. In Arizona, there is dire need for this legislation. Although Arizona came into this Union as the Baby State, it now has growing pains. Since the war, thousands of Americans have gone to Arizona to make their homes. The unprecedented demands on our school system and crowded conditions in areas not yet prepared to cope with these unforeseen increases in population, have created a very real and vital problem. The educational authorities and teachers of Arizona have faced the problem with diligence and true patriotism. Their splendid efforts to continue the high level of education typical of our State, are, indeed, praiseworthy. However, these educational leaders need help. The Arizona treasury is incapable of solving this problem alone. The former taxpayers cannot carry the complete burden of educating the children of the new residents, not yet taxpayers, alone. Arizona needs Federal aid to education. Similar conditions and needs exist in other States. It is to be hoped that the Eighty-first Congress will take immediate steps to safeguard our education.

In addition to backing the Federal-aid-to-education proposals, I have worked diligently in support of higher wages for teachers, since I was convinced that the scale of wages paid to teachers was completely out of harmony with the present costs of living. Through the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House, of which I am a member, I have constantly worked for legislation to open the way for the training and education of scientific and technical personnel. The aftermath of the war has left us in dire need of increased training in this respect. The enactment of the National Science Foundation bill will be instrumental in curing this defect. Since the State of Arizona has been affected more than most States by increased postwar populations, I have endeavored in every way, both in Congress and in cooperation with Government departments and agencies, to secure for Arizona every possible aid in increasing educational facilities and equipment. I have endeavored at all times to cooperate with the educational leaders of our State to develop Arizona's education.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

During the second session of the Eightieth Congress, I have relentlessly continued my sincere efforts in behalf of our Indians. The deplorable and woeful situation of the American Indian has come to light more than ever before. Public opinion has been aroused in behalf of the Indian, and in the law courts of Arizona, I was able this year to secure for the Indians of my State the right to vote. It gives me great satisfaction to forecast that at long last, the American Indian can see the day when he will take his place alongside other American citizens and enjoy the full share of benefits which this country offers its citizens.

I have been in constant contact with the Bureau of Indian Affairs and have urged immediate and adequate action to provide the Indians with a good standard of living, good health services, and good education. It is urgent that the government of Arizona and the Congress of the United States exert every possible effort in behalf of the first residents of this country.

I have been active in securing the continuance of welfare assistance payments to the Indians by the Federal Government until the House Subcommittee on Indian Affairs is able to hold hearings on this matter and report to the Congress for any necessary action. It is not possible for the States of Arizona and New Mexico to carry this burden alone. Although I am not a member of the Subcommittee on Indian Affairs, I have urged the committee to hold hearings at the Indian reservations, and I have been assured by the chairman of that committee that such hearings will be attempted in the near future.

Many other problems have arisen affecting the status of the Indians, and I have fought diligently in every instance to secure just treatment and adequate care for the Indians. I was happy to learn in conference with President Truman that he recognizes the obligations of the Federal Government toward the Indians and will back up our efforts.

I regret to say that this Congress, in my opinion, has not fulfilled its obligations to the Nation's farmer. Unfortunately, vital appropriations for support-prices on agricultural products and for soil conservation have been slashed by this Congress. I doubly regret this action of the majority party in Congress, since it has cut deeply into the agricultural endeavors of Arizona, where farming is one of the chief sources of wealth and life. I have endeavored to set forth the interests of Arizona and the Southwest in agricultural and cattle production and have stressed the necessity of a healthy agricultural program for the entire Nation. During the past months, Arizona has been suffering from the dreadful spread of the hoof-and-mouth disease from our neighboring country of Mexico. I have continued to cooperate in every way possible with the Department of Agriculture to prevent the spread of this disease across our border. I urged enactment of my bill, H. R. 1460, to complete a fence along the Mexico-United States border. Unfortunately, this construction has not yet been authorized.

I was happy to see that some gesture was made during the second session to provide farmers with a long-range farm program, including a schedule of price supports. It is unfortunate that my urgent recommendations for stronger action in this behalf were not completely heeded by the majority party.

MINING

The problems of the miners in Arizona, arising largely out of wartime conditions, have been many and serious. During the first session of the Eightieth Congress, I introduced several bills to protect our mining industry and to help the small miners who had suffered losses during the war. The bill to provide premium price payments to producers of copper, lead, and zinc, which passed the Congress during the first session, was vetoed by the President. In the second session, I introduced a similar bill, and in cooperation with the Members of Congress from the western mining States, I worked diligently for its passage. I again urged enactment of my bill to make possible the prompt settlement by the Federal Government of claims of small miners who suffered losses during the war while increasing their wartime production at the instance of the War Production Board and other Government agencies. These mine owners were prompted to make heavy investments in order to supply minerals essential to the war effort, and their losses should be reimbursed.

In addition to these bills, I also introduced a bill directing the establishment of a Mineral Resources Division within the Department of the Interior to carry out experimentation, investigation, and other necessary research in order to encourage the production of strategic metals and minerals. This bill further authorizes the stock piling of metals and minerals in short supply, which will be essential in case of an emergency. During the second session I repeatedly drew the attention of Congress to this pending legislation. In addition, I worked for the passage of my bill authorizing mining, milling, and smelting loans by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Since mining is one of the main sources of income for Arizona, these bills must be brought up again in the Eighty-first Congress, and every effort must be exerted for their enactment.

NATIONAL DEFENSE AND FOREIGN POLICY

During the second session of the Eightieth Congress, it became evident that this country must take strong measures to secure our national defense and at the same time to strive diligently, by means of a sound foreign policy, to secure the peace of the world.

While the Department of National Defense, created during the first session of this Congress was setting its reorganization in motion, committees of Congress were studying and evaluating the many and difficult factors involved in military training. By use of a questionnaire sent to people in every area of Arizona, I was able to obtain a cross-section of opinion of the people of Arizona concerning this issue. After weighing all the issues and in view of the need of adequate defenses in the present-day world in order to support the machinery for world peace, I voted for the military training bill. It was obvious to me that a majority of people in my State agreed with me that such action was necessary at this time. The dangers of falling into world chaos for lack of adequate preparation makes it necessary to train our young men to defend their country. It is now vital that the Department of National Defense execute this law judiciously and liberally in order that the necessity of military training will not interfere with the education of our youth.

In addition, legislation was passed to support a 70-group air force. The Air Force will play an important role in any future emergency, and Arizona, with its war-proven facilities, climate, and capacity to provide air training, will take an important role in the development of this branch of our defenses. Funds were provided for new military and naval aircraft and for further research in atomic energy; funds were provided for inactive duty pay to Reserve components; and the women's Reserve units were given regular status in the armed services. In view of the lack of an inland harbor on the west coast adequately protected from possible invasion, I introduced H. R. 4386, to authorize the Army engineers to investigate and determine the feasibility of dredging the Colorado River from the Gulf of California to the Imperial Dam, and of constructing such necessary locks and other facilities for the purpose of creating an inland harbor for national defense purposes. In view of the importance of good morale in the armed services, I also introduced H. R. 5724, to provide free postage for members of the armed forces while serving outside the continental limits of the United States.

For some time, it has been apparent that one of the sore points in world relations hinged around the oil of the Middle East. In view of the relations between Arizona and our neighboring Republic of Mexico, I worked for the adoption of a program between the United States and Mexico to develop the oil resources of Mexico, where the greatest known oil reserves on the continent are located, and where they could be most easily developed and purchased by virtue of the proximity of that country. As a result of my efforts and work, the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House, of which I am a member, accepted the invitation of the Mexican Government to make a trip to Mexico this summer to inspect the oil possibilities in Mexico and to work out a program in cooperation with the officials of the Mexican Government, which can be presented to Congress. The results of this trip, which will be the first official trip of a committee of Congress to Mexico, will be of prime importance to this country and to the world.

Several measures were enacted during the second and special sessions to further the European recovery program and to aid the United Nations. During the enactment of these measures, it has been encouraging to note the keen interest of the people of Arizona in our international affairs and in the achievement of peace throughout the world.

Many other issues were considered during the second and special session of the Eightieth Congress, which space does not permit me to discuss. I have been keenly concerned with all legislation affecting veterans and the training of veterans under the GI bill of rights. I strongly opposed the attempt to curtail flight training from the GI bill of rights during the second session. Later, although Congress did not curtail flight training, I appeared before the House Committee on Veterans' Affairs and urged the committee and the Veterans' Administrator to take immediate steps to correct the action of the Veterans' Administration to eliminate flight training, although such elimination had not been authorized by law. After stressing the importance of flight training to our national defense and the active interest of Arizona in flight training, I was assured by the Administrator and by the committee that such training would not be curtailed. There was a dire need for housing legislation during this Congress. Unfortunately the bill which was enacted was a weak remedy for the desperate situation. In view of the lack of adequate action by Congress and of the immediate housing needs in Arizona, I have proposed a State housing authority in Arizona to provide homes, especially for disabled veterans. During the second session, my bill providing for the issuance of a commemorative stamp in honor of the fiftieth anniversary of the Rough Riders of the Spanish-American War, illustrated by a picture of the statue of Buckey O'Neill standing in Prescott, Ariz., was enacted into law. This stamp will be issued in the city of Prescott, Ariz., on the 27th of October of this year.

Other issues, which were carry-overs from the first session of the Eightieth Congress, still remained unsolved. An amended labor-management act, a long-range farm program, reciprocal trade amendments, an improved health program, old-age pensions and social-security benefits and adequate increases of pay for Federal and postal employees have all been left unsolved. I appeared before both the House and Senate Committees on Post Office and Civil Service and made strong recommendations in the matter of pay increases. It is my sincere conviction that loyal Government workers should not be treated so lightly in times when the costs of living make it difficult for their present salaries to suffice. The same is true of pensioners and annuitants and our aged citizens, whose meager incomes are not anywhere near on par with inflated costs.

In striving to obtain good legislation to meet our country's problems on the floor of the House and in congressional committees, I have found it necessary to intercede for my State and for individuals in Arizona with various Government agencies, in whose hands lies the proper execution of the laws of Congress. I have been in frequent contact with the Department of the Interior, the War Assets Administration, the State Department, the Department of National Defense, the Civil Aeronautics Administration and Civil Aeronautics Board and other agencies with reference to many and important matters and incidents of great importance to the people of Arizona. I have been fortunate in representing an interested and cooperative group of people, who have always brought important matters to my immediate attention and who are willing to cooperate in their dispensation. The great response I received earlier this year to my questionnaire, Opinions of the Folks at Home, was, indeed, helpful in focusing my particular attention on those issues which were of greatest interest to the people of my State. Since I am running for the office of Governor of Arizona at the next election, I regret that I will not be a Member of the Eighty-first Congress. It is my sincere hope that I can continue my efforts in behalf of the State of Arizona and its people toward the completion of the many pending issues which are of vital importance to Arizona.

Civil-Rights Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JOHN A. BLATNIK

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. BLATNIK. Mr. Speaker, the central theme in our American heritage is the importance and dignity of the individual—the idea that all men are endowed with the inalienable rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. The founding fathers recognized this great truth, and wrote into the Constitution and its Bill of Rights the democratic principles of freedom and equality. These two principles have become a part of the precious heritage of the American people, and form the spirit and substance of the American way of life.

Yet we must recognize that these ideals of democracy have not been completely realized in practice. We have made great strides toward these goals during our 175 years of national independence, but our achievements must not blind us to our mistakes and shortcomings. Great numbers of our people are not allowed to vote today; rank discrimination of all kinds is practiced against racial, religious, and political minorities; and mob action is still common in many parts of the country. I will use the few minutes at my disposal to review the civil-rights question, and suggest some remedial legislation to protect civil liberties, and to extend the principles of democracy to the whole population.

DISCRIMINATION AND SEGREGATION

Discrimination takes many forms—political, economic, and social. One of the most vicious practices is the denial of full-voting privileges to great sections of our population, which means that many American citizens are reduced to the rank of second-class citizens. As the report of the President's Committee on Civil Rights points out, millions of Negroes and poor whites in the South are disfranchised by means of the poll tax and other discriminatory and undemocratic restrictions on suffrage. The citizens of the District of Columbia are excluded from voting as a result of outmoded national traditions, and congressional indifference to their problems.

Minority groups are subject to the most flagrant forms of discrimination with respect to employment in both Government and private industry. Discriminatory hiring practices fall most heavily upon the Negro people—the FEPC report showed that during the war years four out of five cases of discrimination involved Negroes. However, those of the Jewish faith as well as Catholics, Mexicans, Indians, and Japanese-Americans are also the victims of hiring-hall prejudice.

In addition, the minority worker often finds himself subject to on-the-job discrimination. After securing a job, he discovers that his pay is less than that received by other workers doing the same kind of work. For example, the average weekly wage for white veterans in the South is from 30 to 70 percent higher than for Negro veterans engaged in the same kind of activity. Furthermore, the minority worker is the victim of prejudice when it comes to promotions. A recent case study shows that it takes the average Negro employee 7 times as long to obtain a promotion as the white worker of the same efficiency. To make matters worse, it is the minority worker who is laid off first when the labor force is reduced, which means that minority groups suffer first and most during periods of unemployment.

The many other forms of discrimination practiced against minorities are notorious. As everyone knows, Negroes in the South are forced to attend "Jim Crow" schools which are inferior to those available to white children, and are forced to live in colored ghettos. They find themselves segregated with respect to bus and railroad travel, and are denied services in hotels, cafes, movies, and barber shops. They suffer from unequal opportunities to secure medical and hospital services, and public parks and playgrounds are denied to them. Nor is the South the only offender—the "Jim Crow" is prevalent even in the North, especially in connection with hotels, housing, and cafe accommodations.

Although the Negro is the No. 1 victim, discriminatory practices also work to the detriment of other minorities. In the Southwest, Mexicans are barred from places of recreation. Jews are often discriminated against in resort areas in every section of the country, and find "Gentile only" signs in apartment houses. "No Japs wanted" signs greet the Japanese-American who enters west coast cafes.

I regret to say that racial discrimination even exists in the United States armed forces, and that it was practiced all during the war years. Discrimination and segregation are evil and ugly things under any circumstances but becomes particularly repugnant in the Army, where all men are fighting and dying in the service of freedom. Yet Negroes were, and are today, segregated into "Jim Crow" Army units, and are discriminated against in respect to promotions and commissions. Negroes are also faced with an absolute bar against enlistments in any branch of the Marine Corps other than the stewards' branch, and in the Navy colored sailors serve out their hitch as mess boys and personal servants for the officer caste.

This same evil exists in the State National Guard units—in fact, the condition is being perpetuated by existing Army regulations. A recent ruling by Secretary of the Army Kenneth C. Royall on the question of segregation in the Minnesota National Guard underscores this policy. Five months ago Minnesota's Gov. Luther Youngdahl, acting on the recommendation of the State interracial commission, asked Secretary Royall to change the Army regulations to permit the recruitment of Negroes into the State Guard on a nonsegregated basis. White and Negro soldiers today serve in the same units of the New Jersey National Guard, where the State constitution prohibits segregation, and inasmuch as Minnesota has a civil-rights statute dating back to 1885 prohibiting discrimination in public places, an antisegregation policy in the Minnesota National Guard seems in order.

But Secretary Royall has rejected this request for a change in regulations, and has stated that should Minnesota initiate nonsegregation in her National Guard, then Federal funds would be withdrawn. I wrote two letters to General Royall urging him to change his position, but my letters were not answered.

Finally, when the President issued his July 26 order to the effect that equality of treatment and opportunity should prevail in the armed forces, I was informed that the question of nonsegregation in the Minnesota National Guard was being referred to the President's Committee on Segregation in the Armed Forces. This action means months of needless delay and indicates a desire to postpone the decision as long as possible.

LYNCHING AND MOB RULE

Liberty means not only the right to vote and freedom of opportunity, but it also implies that the individual shall be secure from illegal violence and mob action. Minority groups in America, however, do not always enjoy this security. Year after year, Negroes are lynched in the South on the flimsiest of pretexts, with the lynchers usually going unpunished. In 1946 at least six persons were lynched by lawless mobs; among them was Roger Malcolm, his wife, and another couple, who were murdered by a lynch mob in Monroe, Ga., and no effort was made to indict the lynchers. Another shocking example occurred on February 17, 1947, in Greenville, S. C., where Willie Earle was shot to death, and the 31 members of the mob were acquitted in the local court in a flagrant miscarriage of justice. Although these crimes against the Negro people are largely confined to the South, they also happen in the Northern States.

Other infringements upon the individual's security are also widespread. In many localities undisciplined and lawless police officials are guilty of many acts of misconduct. This includes violent physical attacks by police on minority members, brutality against prisoners, third-degree methods to extort confessions, unwarranted arrests, and abuse of the search and seizure power. Trial by jury is often no protection against such police lawlessness inasmuch as minority groups are often denied jury representation. The brunt of illegal police activity falls most heavily upon Negroes, Mexicans, union organizers, and unpopular political and religious minorities. Police officials in many large cities are notoriously "trigger happy" where weak or poor persons are concerned.

A FEDERAL CIVIL-RIGHTS PROGRAM IS NEEDED

Mr. Speaker, America has a great tradition with respect to civil liberties, but an objective survey of the situation shows that our record is far from perfect. The realization of the American ideal of freedom and equality awaits realization. Millions are denied the right of suffrage, minorities are discriminated against with respect to education, housing and public services, and in public and private employment. The evil of race segregation hangs as a dark cloud of oppression over the Southern States, and extends to the United States Army. Lynch mobs terrorize and murder minority people.

Congressional action to correct this unhealthy situation is justified from every point of view. Morally we are obligated to act since this would be in accordance with established public law, and our belief in democracy. Economically speaking, the elimination of segregation and the granting of full legal, political, social, and economic rights to all citizens, would pay off in terms of more efficient use of our labor force and higher standards of living for our people. It can also be justified in terms of political expediency—with the United States competing for the leadership of the peoples of the world today, we cannot afford the embarrassment of undemocratic "skeletons" in our national closet.

In my opinion, Congress is obligated to review the whole question of civil rights, and to formulate a broad program to secure these rights and to extend the principles of freedom and equality to all the people. We should adopt the anti-poll-tax law to give the vote to the Negroes and poor white people of the South. If necessary, additional legislation should also be enacted to give Federal police protection to southern voters on election day to check the efforts of local officials and hoodlums to prevent their participation in the electoral process.

Congress should pass the FEPC bill to provide equality of opportunity to all citizens, and to prevent hiring hall and on-the-job discrimination against minorities. The antilynching bill should be adopted, containing adequate penalties to discourage violations, and make such penalties enforceable in the Federal courts. A Civil Rights Division should be established in the Department of Justice to investigate all violations of civil rights, to utilize civil actions to discourage violations, and to report periodically to the Congress with its recommendations for additional legislation to implement and promote the enjoyment of freedom and equality by all the people.

Finally, we must recognize the role of the people themselves in the fight for civil rights. There is a direct relationship between the climate of public opinion and the enjoyment of civil rights. The Government should therefore take the lead in establishing a long-term program of education to inform the people of the civil rights to which they are entitled. Our political and community leaders should provide leadership in rallying the people to the support of a continuing program to strengthen civil rights, and to extend the principles of democracy throughout the whole pattern of our society. As a great American once said, "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty"—the people must be ever on guard against reactionary forces who would curtail their liberties, and be prepared to oppose at a minute's notice the forces of prejudice, discrimination, and hate.

I am convinced that a Federal program based on the anti-poll-tax, antilynching, and FEPC bills would represent a great stride toward the goal of full civil rights for our people. Congress was obligated, in the name of democracy, to enact this program into law during the special session. Instead the Republican leadership chose to dodge the issue by cooperating with southern Senators in a friendly filibuster. It is my hope that when the Eighty-first Congress convenes next January, the present do-nothing policy of the GOP will be rejected in favor of a broad program of extending democratic rights to all citizens.

We Need Effective Inflation Controls

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ARTHUR G. KLEIN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, my mind goes back to another hour of danger and crisis which we faced a little less than 7 years ago. Many of you will remember the solemn hour of December 8, 1941, when this Nation and its elected representatives faced the mortal danger of the dastardly attack by the Japanese on Pearl Harbor. In that hour all Americans, regardless of race or color or creed, or political opinion, stood as one man to defend our country against the threat of total destruction by an external enemy.

The crisis which confronts our country today is no less serious than the one we faced 7 years ago, and it will take the same determination, the same courage, and the same unity of purpose to defend America now as it took 7 years ago.

Let me say at the outset that what I have to say today is not the expression of any partisan spirit. When it comes to defending our Nation against destruction from without or within, there cannot be any difference of opinion between Republicans and Democrats, between North and South, between rich and poor, between worker or farmer or businessman or housewife. In times of crisis we know only one battle line between the American people and their enemies.

DANGER IS DEADLY

The danger of inflation which confronts us today is no less deadly than the danger which confronted us on the day after Pearl Harbor. If left unchecked, it may destroy our homes and our families as completely and effectively as any enemy's airplanes or battleships, bombs, or shells could ever do.

Twice in the last 2 years many of us on this side of the aisle tried our best to warn this Congress and this Nation against the very crisis which is upon us today. Twice within the last 2 years the majority of Congress chose to disregard our warnings. It does not happen often in history that later events prove as clearly and convincingly which side was right and which side was wrong as has happened in this case, and it happens rarely indeed that a nation gets another chance to ward off disaster as the American people have today.

In June 1946, the question before this House was simply whether Congress should continue effective price control or whether we should let nature take its course and hope that the laws of supply and demand alone would be enough to protect our economic stability. Today the record shows clearly and incontrovertibly that we made a great mistake 2 years ago and that, unless we take immediate effective steps to correct that mistake, the prosperity and well-being of the American people which we have carefully and successfully restored since the disastrous days of 1929 may be wrecked and ruined within the next few months.

DOLLAR WORTH SIX BITS

Let us look at the record. In June 1946 when, by action of Congress, effective price control was ended in the United States, the consumers' price index stood at 133.3 of the average for the years 1935–39. Today it stands at 171.7. Or, to put it differently, in terms which every American can understand, last week the average American consumer had to pay $1.29 where he paid only $1 2 years ago. In 2 years the purchasing power of the dollar has been reduced to only a little more than 75 cents.

Food prices have increased even more than the over-all cost of living. Last week $1.47 was needed to buy the same amount of food which Americans could buy for a dollar 2 years ago.

Worst of all, there is no end in sight of this inflationary trend. Prices have risen steadily and almost without interruption week by week and month by month since June 1946.

As you look at the figures released by the various departments of government as cold, statistical facts, you get the feeling of a man who stands at the bank of a river which is rising inch by inch, hour by hour coming closer and closer to the crest of the dike, and you can't tell with absolute certainty when the moment will come when the floods will sweep the whole embankment and destroy everything that lies in their way. The people who live along the thousands of miles of our seashores, the people who live in our great river valleys in the North and South and in the center of this country, know this feeling of fear and desperation in the face of rising tides. Today there is no home in these United States which may not be swept away by the floods of inflation tomorrow.

We have made great strides over centuries in learning to control the forces of nature and to protect ourselves against the disastrous floods which, until not so many years ago, year after year destroyed thousands of homes and killed thousands of people. Today the forces of our economic life are no more beyond our control than the forces of nature. Just as we have learned to build dams and dikes against floods and tidal waves, we have learned also to bring order out of chaos in the field of economics.

OPA WORKED

Let us look again at the record. Shortly after the outbreak of World War II,

Congress passed the Emergency Price Control Act. With the authority given him by this act of Congress, President Roosevelt issued in May 1943 his "hold-the-line" order, which was the beginning of effective price control. That was the time of the greatest inflationary pressure on the domestic market this country has ever known. The largest part of all the goods and services produced by our Nation's economy was needed to carry on the war and little was left to satisfy the demand for civilian goods from a Nation whose purchasing power was greater than ever before. Had the law of supply and demand been allowed to reign unchecked, prices would have skyrocketed to unprecedented heights.

In reality, thanks to price control, prices remained almost completely stable during the 3 years from May 1943 to June 1946. Consumers' prices rose only 6.5 percent, or to put it again in simpler terms, the American family could still buy for $1.065 the same amount of goods in June 1946 for which they had paid $1 in May 1943. In 3 years of price control, prices rose 6½ percent. In 2 years since the end of price control, prices have risen almost 29 percent.

What more is needed to prove that those of us who demanded 2 years ago that price control should be continued were right and that those who said we could do without were wrong?

FACTS DISTORTED

There are some people inside and outside the Halls of Congress who say that the average American has not suffered as much from rising prices as the figures of the consumers price index would indicate. They say, "Sure, prices have gone up, but so have wages and salaries, and in the end it all comes out even." Those who use this argument either do not know the facts or they distort the facts.

The truth of the matter is that while prices have risen by 29 percent since June 1946, average weekly earnings in manufacturing have risen by only 22 percent; or to put it again in simpler terms, to maintain the standard of living which he reached in June 1946, the American worker would have to earn $1.29, while in reality he earns only $1.22. Even during the 3 years of effective price control, the cost of living rose by 6½ percent, while average weekly earnings increased by only one-half of 1 percent. What is happening today is that the American worker is beginning to lose with ever-growing speed the small gains in his standard of living which he has made over the past 10 years.

Two years ago when we debated in this chamber the question of price control, most of us on this side of the aisle argued that the American people as a whole still needed the protection which OPA had given them so successfully throughout the war.

Alined against us was every organization representing the interests of business. Everyone of them claimed that they were not representing special interests, but that if price controls were removed the American people, as a whole, would benefit.

NAM PROMISES

Let me quote you this sentence from a newspaper advertisement which the National Association of Manufacturers published in July 1946, in thousands of newspapers from coast to coast:

If OPA is permanently discontinued, the production of goods will mount rapidly and through free competition prices will quickly adjust themselves to levels that consumers are willing to pay.

An overwhelming majority of the Members of this House on the other side of the aisle chose to accept this propaganda at its face value. By doing so they stand convicted today of having fostered the highest wave of private profiteering that has ever swept over this country. Since price control was ended in June 1946, profits of corporations have increased 110 percent; or to put it again in simpler terms, where American corporations earned $1 during the first quarter of 1946, they earned $2.10 during the first quarter of 1948. Yes, since the destruction of price control, the poor have become poorer and the rich have become richer. The case for price control is the case of the American people versus the profiteer.

Regardless of any temporary set-back we have suffered at the hands of the Republican Eightieth Congress, the Democratic Party under the leadership of President Truman will continue this fight until it is won.

TEN-POINT PROGRAM

Last November President Truman submitted to the special session of Congress a 10-point anti-inflation program warning that unless Congress would enact his recommendations into law inflation would continue unchecked. Inflation has continued, but the Congress has not acted on the President's program. A week ago the President submitted essentially the same program again. Congress would be derelict in its duty if it would not act on this program now. It is a comprehensive program. It would not be sufficient to enact just one or two of the eight points recommended by the President. No one single measure can cure inflation. We need all of them—the excess-profits tax, consumer-credit controls, control of inflationary bank credit, a check on speculation on the commodity exchanges, allocation and inventory control of scarce commodities, strengthened rent control, stand-by authority to ration products in short supply, and price control for scarce commodities, including wage controls where wage increases would endanger price ceilings.

Nobody likes these measures because nobody likes controls, but there is no easy way out of the present emergency and Congress must have the courage to take steps even though they may be unpopular, if they are the only ones which can prevent economic disaster.

BUSINESS AS USUAL?

Again, as they have always done in the past, the Republicans are looking for an easy way out. They are deceiving the American people by telling the country that there is an easy way out. This time the slogan is "We can lick inflation by orthodox methods." This is only a different way of saying, "Let's continue business as usual"—the slogan with which they hampered the war effort of this country during World War II. It is only a different way of saying "Let's get back to normalcy"—the slogan with which the last Republican administrations in the twenties brought on the greatest depression this country has ever seen.

The Republican attack on the President's program consists of three main arguments: One, we can lick inflation by manipulation of our fiscal policies. Two, the President can control inflation by using the powers already granted to him under existing laws. Three, we need not do anything because inflation will cure itself.

The principal spokesman for the first line of attack is my good friend, the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee.

He wants the Federal Reserve Board and the Treasury to increase the rediscount rate and thinks that this will limit credit expansion and thereby check inflation. This proposal by itself is both ineffective for the purpose the gentleman wants to accomplish and, at the same time, if used drastically it would have disastrous consequences to the savings of millions of Americans. One look at the financial reports of our corporations must convince everybody that profits are so exorbitant at the present time and that the possibility of making money is so extraordinary that a small increase in the interest rate will not stop business from borrowing more and more money to finance new plants and new equipment.

DANGEROUS BOND DEAL

However, an increase in the rediscount rate would have the immediate effect of inviting banks and other large holders of Government securities to get rid of their Government bonds in order to invest their money in papers which yield higher interest rates. A collapse of the Government bond market would be the inevitable result. At present, the need for the Government to support the bond market is relatively small because the faith of the American people in the word of their Government has not been shaken. Even to talk about the possibility that the price of Government bonds might fall, borders close on committing economic treachery.

During the war and since, millions of Americans, for patriotic reasons and with complete confidence in the good faith of their Government, have invested their small savings in war bonds and other Government securities. If we use the orthodox methods proposed by the Republican Party, Government bonds may drop in value to as little as 80 cents on the dollar, as they did after World War I. Does the Republican Party propose to rob untold millions of our citizens of as much as one-fifth of their savings?

REPUBLICAN ATTACK FUTILE

The second line of attack by the Republican Party on the President's program is as futile and ineffective as the first. They say that if the President would use his present powers in the fields of consumer-credit control and export control inflation could be halted by measures in these two fields alone, and Congress, therefore, need not grant the President any additional powers. The President's powers to continue consumer-credit controls was taken away from him by act of Congress in July 1947. Only if the President would declare a national emergency under an ancient statute, namely, the Trading With the Enemy Act of 1917, could he restore consumer-credit controls. It seems preposterous to ask the President to declare a national emergency by Presidential proclamation for the sole purpose of reviving what was known as regulation W. Time and time again Congress has criticized the President—and nobody has been more vocal in doing so than the spokesmen of the Republican Party—for using his emergency powers in dictatorial fashion. Action by Congress is therefore unavoidable on this as on all the other points of the President's program.

EXPORTS MINOR FACTOR

Export controls are now being exercised by the President for every commodity which is in short supply. But it is ridiculous to expect export control alone to relieve the dangers of inflation. According to the most careful estimates of the United States Department of Commerce, only 2.5 percent of our total national product will be exported during the year 1948. Elimination of our exports would make no more than a slight dent in existing inflation pressures.

Finally, the Republican Party would prefer most of all the customary time-dishonored policy of doing nothing and letting nature take its course. This would be essentially the same policy which the Republican Party rammed down the throats of Congress in the summer of 1946 when they destroyed price control. Senator ROBERT A. TAFT, chairman of the Republican policy committee, said on the floor of the Senate on July 24, 1946, and I quote:

> If the consumers think the price is too high today, they will wait until prices are lower. I feel that in time the law of supply and demand would bring prices into line.

When this statement was made, the price index for food was 145.6. Today it is 214.1. Surely, it is easy for the giant corporations whose profits soar higher and higher every month to sit and wait until the storm blows over. For the millions of Americans whose incomes shrink while their expenditures keep going up and up, waiting means starving. Every day that passes without inflation being checked is a day of growing depression. It is unthinkable that we, as the elected representatives of the American people, should go home this week without having done our duty. Even at this late hour I am appealing to every Member of Congress, regardless of party label, to enact into law the courageous program proposed to us by President Truman.

An Answer to the Distorted Statements of Real-Estate Lobbyists

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, on August 2, 1948, Representative HOMER ANGELL, Republican, of Oregon, inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a letter he received from Morton Bodfish which claimed that home ownership and home purchase in the United States were not "limited to the well-to-do."

Mr. Bodfish is the executive vice president, guiding spirit, and chief lobbyist for the United States Savings and Loan League. This league has 4,000 member banks with average assets of nearly $1,000,000 each in real-estate mortgages. The league's principal purpose in life lately has been to see that the housing shortage is continued, that new houses remain high-priced, that rents go higher, that no one not now in the industry builds houses, and so forth. In effect, the league's aim is to see to it that high profits are maintained for the mortgage interests whether the Nation's housing needs are met or not.

Mr. Bodfish, as chief lobbyist for this organization and working closely with other lobbyists, Herbert U. Nelson of the National Association of Real Estate Boards and Arthur W. Binns of the National Home and Property Owners Foundation, has directed most of his efforts to killing the T-E-W long-range housing bill, which promised to provide decent homes at reasonable prices to American citizens.

The letter of Mr. Bodfish that was carried in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD purported to prove that home ownership and home purchase in the United States is not "limited to the well-to-do." He used and misused recent reports of the United States Bureau of the Census and the Federal Reserve Board to make this charge. Now, no amount of statistic juggling by Mr. Bodfish can convince the 10,000,000 house-hunting families—the veteran doubled up with his in-laws, the millions of slum dwellers, the citizens crowded into American ghettoes—that there are enough houses or that they are within a price range that the average citizen can afford. And neither can Mr. Bodfish prove it through use of reliable data. His letter is compounded of deliberate falsehoods, prejudiced selections, and glaring omissions of important material.

His first table attempts to prove that in 1940, 45 percent of the families with annual incomes of less than $500 a year owned their own homes. He claims this data was derived from the United States Bureau of the Census report, 1940 Population and Housing, Families, Tenure and Rent, page 96. Actually, this report shows no such thing. It reports only "wage and salary income," which is by no stretch of the imagination to be computed as "annual family income," as Mr. Bodfish claims. It does not include income from nonfarm operation of business or profession, the source of some of the largest incomes in the country. Nor does it include income from rents, royalties, stocks, bonds, pensions, social security, insurance, alimony, armed forces pay, and other regular sources of income for many citizens. Thus, Mr. Bodfish distorts the census report when he heads his column, "annual family income," but includes only wage and salary income.

On the same page of this census report is carried home ownership by wage and salary income "without other income"—Bureau of Census, 1940 Population and Housing, Families, Tenure, and Rent, page 96, line 41. Using this figure, we find that less than 10 percent of families with less than $500 own their own homes, rather than the 45 percent Mr. Bodfish claims. Actually, no figures on home ownership by total family income are available. But statistics do show that over half of all the families in the United States who owned their own homes in 1940 had other income besides wages and salaries—Bureau of Census, 1940 Population and Housing, Families, Income, and Rent, page 67. More than four out of five of every owner family with no specified persons in the labor force had other income—Bureau of Census, 1940 Population and Housing, Families, Income, and Rent, page 67.

How ridiculous Mr. Bodfish's figures are is evidenced by the fact that he would, by his definition, include in the group "annual family income of less than $500," over a half million tenant families who pay more than $40 a month in rents, many paying over $75 a month—Bureau of Census, 1940 Population and Housing, Families, Tenure, and Rent, pages 96, lines 66–69. That is quite a feat for families, whom Mr. Bodfish would claim have monthly family incomes of less than $42.

For his 1947 home ownership figures Mr. Bodfish uses more reliable data. But it is the glaring omissions of his data that make them useless. In computing home ownership in 1947 he fails to include data showing:

First. How many of these homes are inherited, how many purchased from savings, how many obtained during better times when the family's income was much higher and the price of a home much lower.

Second. How many of these families live in units that are not fit as shelters for American citizens.

Third. The fact that home ownership today is patterned on the basis of the past 20 years' home price structure, which has undergone extreme changes during the war and the postwar inflationary period.

Fourth. Other factors, such as the number of veterans whose income earnings in 1946 were the extremely low Army pay but who purchased homes in 1947 on the basis of civilian income.

Actually, there are no figures by which home ownership can be computed in terms of family assets. Nor are there figures showing the number of families of low income who inherited homes. Nor are there figures showing the type of dwelling purchased by low-income groups, although evidence is available in every neighborhood in the United States to show that much of this so-called low-income home ownership consists of shacks, firetraps, and buildings not fit to house American citizens.

But figures will probably be available this fall. Meanwhile, we cannot give definite proof of our impressions any more than Mr. Bodfish can of his. But we can give a few facts from available statistics showing that Mr. Bodfish's claims are based on selected data and neglect many important factors.

Home ownership by inheritance: No data available on exact number. It is known that many families of low income have inherited homes from forefathers in a much better financial position.

Home ownership from savings: Many families of low income purchased their homes from savings collected during higher-income periods. A realistic appraisal of home ownership and wealth would include the family's liquid assets, since income alone is not a measure of wealth. It is known that a larger percentage of elder citizens own their own homes than of younger age groups. The families with male heads that owned their own homes in 1940 are shown by percentage within each age group on the following page:

Urban and rural nonfarm families by age of male head, by tenure within each age group [1]

Age group (by male head):	Percentage within each owning own home
Under 25	10.7
25–34	22.2
35–44	34.2
45–54	62.0
55–64	48.8
65–74	55.7

[1] Bureau of Census, "1940 Population and Housing, Families, Tenure and Rent," page 41.

At the same time, it is known that family income drops rapidly as the male head passes his prime. Following table gives the percentage of families within each age group whose annual incomes totaled more than $2,000 in 1946—Bureau of Census, Current Population Reports, Consumer Income, series P–60, 3, page 13:

Age group (by male head):	Percentage receiving more than $2,000 annual income
Under 25	62.0
25–34	83.7
35–44	83.0
45–54	83.7
55–64	78.7

These two tables show that as people approach old age their income falls off while their chances of owning their own homes increase. It means that homes were purchased in periods of greater earning power and retained while the older citizens retire or are pensioned, proving again that income alone is not a measure of wealth.

Home ownership and housing standards: To say that a given number or percentage of Americans own a house is not enough. We must ask the question: "What kind of home—is it fit shelter for an American family?" The answer is that almost one out of every three owner-occupied dwelling units in the United States is not. Over 6,500,000 houses in the United States are in need of major repairs, lack running water, or do not meet adequate sanitary standards—Bureau of Census, Current Population Reports, Housing, series P–70, 1, page 11. Almost 3,500,000 of these units are urban and rural nonfarm owner-occupied dwellings. More than 20 percent of our owner-occupied urban and rural nonfarm units are not up to American standards. It can be pointed out here that the number of dwelling units owned by families whose annual income is less than $2,000 is just slightly higher—3,530,000—than the number of units—3,461,000—which are not up to the standard American citizens deserve.

Mr. Bodfish next makes the claim:

> That many low-income families can buy homes * * * is shown by the fact that many such families are actually buying homes.

In spite of the fact that he misuses the Federal Reserve Board statistics and leaves glaring omissions, his own figures fail to bear out this fantastic charge.

Although 50.6 percent of urban and rural nonfarm American families earn less than $3,000 a year—P–60, No. 3, page 13—only 39 percent of homes, both new and used, were sold to families within this category. It is obvious that the housing market is not geared to the American family income. And it must be remembered that the inclusion of purchases of used houses includes decrepit and below-standard units.

But the alarming thing to be brought to the attention of the American family is the trend in home buying. Mr. Bodfish omitted that part of the Federal Reserve Board report which depicts this trend. He confidently predicts the total purchases that will be made by each family income group in spite of the fact that the Federal Reserve Board Bulletin shows that only one-half the families with incomes of $1,000 to $1,999 who had intended to buy a home in 1947 actually were able to do so.

The fact is that lower-income groups are rapidly being squeezed out of the housing market. This fact is brought out in the table Mr. Bodfish uses, but he conveniently neglects to carry the full table or point out the trend evident even in that portion he uses.

Actual and prospective buyers as percentage of all spending units within different income groups [1]

Income group	1946		1947		1948, intended
	Intended	Actual	Intended	Actual
Less than $1,000	4	3	1	1	[2]
$1,000 to $1,999	7	6	6	3	2
$2,000 to $2,999	9	7	6	4	6
$3,000 to $4,999	9	8	8	7	8
$5,000 and over	11	13	9	6	10

[1] Federal Reserve Board, 1948 Survey of Consumer Finances, pt. 1, p. 8.
[2] Not carried because it is less than ½ of 1 percent.

These figures are alarming to those Americans who believe in home ownership or at least opportunity to own a home. They show that in the lowest income group home purchases within a short 3-year period fell from 4 percent to as low as less than one-half of 1 percent. That in the next lowest income group home purchases for 1948 will probably be less than one-fourth the number who purchased just two years ago—notice that actual purchases in 1947 were only one-half the number of intended purchases. And that in the group within which falls the medium income of the United States intended purchases fell one-third from actual purchases two years earlier. The relative stability of the two upper income groups proves that the lower income groups are bearing the burden of the housing squeeze.

That assets are a more important criterion of ability to purchase homes than incomes is obvious. Income is not a true measure of wealth. The table above shows that of all families earning less than $2,000, only 2 percent purchased homes in 1947. The Federal Reserve Board reports that 7 percent of the liquid assets of all spending units with an income of less than $2,000 was reduced for the purpose of housing and investments—Federal Reserve Board, 1948 Survey of Consumer Finances, part III, table 7. On page 8 of this report the Federal Reserve Board states:

> In terms of the amounts of liquid assets used for various purposes in 1947, it is estimated that approximately one-half of the total decrease in holdings was used for the purchase of houses or for investment purposes.

The reason the little people are being squeezed out of the housing market is because of the soaring rise in housing prices. Since 1939 the price for a new home has doubled. Just since 1946 the average price for all houses, new and used, rose by almost one-half—more than 48 percent—Federal Reserve Board, 1948 Survey of Consumer Finances, part I, table 1.

Actual statistics on home ownership by wealth—which Mr. Bodfish terms as "well-to-do"—are not compiled. It is therefore ridiculous for Mr. Bodfish to claim that home ownership and home purchase are not limited to the well-to-do and then use another basis for proving his point.

In the final analysis, the decision must come from the American people. No amount of clever figure juggling can convince the veteran that homes are available at a price he can afford to pay. Nor can the slum dweller, the citizens confined to blighted areas, the newlyweds doubled up with in-laws, the residents of shacks, trailers, boats, barns, sheds, and substandard housing be told that good homes can be purchased at a reasonable price.

The facts are that there are not enough houses in the United States to house one-third of American families adequately, that another one-third cannot afford to pay the price of a new house today, and that for the top 10 percent housing is a precarious investment.

The housing industry and its satellites have proved to be archaic in their approach, medieval in their methods, flimsy in their financing, and polluted in their politics. It is the only large industry in the United States that has not joined in the march of technological advance and is still doing most things in a style popular before the Civil War. Its financial structure is intricate and inadequate. And Mr. Bodfish's latest endeavor is another indication of its corrupt political methods.

If these interests would spend as much time and energy in building decent homes at a price American families could afford to pay as they do in trying to convince homeless Americans that there is no housing problem that they cannot meet, we might be a lot further toward our goal of meeting the housing crisis.

EMPLOYMENT SERVICE

The American Legion has consistently insisted that there should be established a public employment service which would accord to veterans preference in counseling and placement. This conception of the Federal responsibility was enacted in the law by the Congress in 1933 under the Wagner-Peyser Act which was sponsored by the American Legion. In 1944, under title IV of the Legion's GI bill, provision was made for the strengthening of the Veterans' Employment Service. In the development of a proper veterans' employment service the Seventy-ninth Congress appropriated sufficient funds for the Veterans' Employment Service to provide for the appointment of field representatives. Their function was to interview employers and secure for veterans, job listings. These field representatives unearthed job opportunities for veterans that had not previously been secured by the Employment Service and, as a result, many veterans secured placement in positions they normally would not have secured.

The first session of the Eightieth Congress denied to the Veterans' Employment Service the funds necessary to carry on the work of the field representatives, and, in addition, refused appropriations for that service so that necessary functions have been seriously curtailed. It is to be regretted that the Congress in its apparent desire for economy has affected the Veterans' Employment Service in this matter. It is imperative that sufficient appropriations be secured for the Veterans' Employment Service so that a worth-while job can be accomplished.

Thirty-six resolutions covering this subject matter and protesting the action by the Congress in reducing appropriations for the Veterans' Employment Service have been submitted by the respective departments. These resolutions are: Nos. 635, 8, 24, 34, 40, 48, 62, 79, 85, 110, 143, 171, 190, 196, 211, 240, 260, 270, 275, 288, 291, 299, 307, 334, 416, 429, 501, 568, 594, 679, 691, 708, 732, 735, 736, 745.

Your committee recommends the adoption of Resolution No. 635 and considers the other resolutions as being combined in said resolution:

"Whereas the Eightieth Congress failed to appropriate sufficient funds for the proper functioning of the Veterans' Employment Service, necessitating the release of the field representatives who had performed a remarkable service in contacting employers and securing job listings for veterans, and further reduced appropriations vitally necessary for the other necessary functions of this service; and

"Whereas the curtailment of these essential activities results in denying to veterans the 'effective job counseling and placement service for veterans to assure a maximum of job opportunity in the field of gainful employment' as contemplated by the American Legion and as specifically provided by the Congress in the enactment of title IV of the Legion's GI bill: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the American Legion in convention assembled in New York, N. Y., August 28, 29, 30, and 31, 1947, That we urge the Eightieth Congress, immediately upon reconvening, to adequately increase the appropriations for the Veterans' Employment Service so as to provide for the employment of the required number of field representatives and for all other necessary functions of this important service; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Veterans' Employment Service be maintained as a Federal operation and as a separate organizational entity; and be it further

"Resolved, That title IV of the Legion's GI bill be amended accordingly."

We further recommend that the legislative committee and the legislative director devote the full efforts of the American Legion in securing the passage of the necessary measures to provide an adequate veterans' employment service, and that the services of the chairman of the standing national employment committee and the national employment director be utilized in presenting to the Congress the necessity for this corrective legislation.

The Eightieth Congress likewise failed to appropriate sufficient funds for the proper staffing and functioning of the State employment services and the United States Employment Service. Unless these services are properly staffed veterans will not receive the proper counseling and placement service contemplated by title IV of the Legion's GI bill. We, therefore, recommend the adoption of resolution 825, which is as follows:

"Whereas the Eightieth Congress failed to appropriate sufficient funds for the proper staffing of many of the State employment services and of the United States Employment Service, necessitating the release of valuable personnel of both the State and the United States Employment Service, and further reduced appropriations vitally necessary for the other important functions of these services; and

"Whereas the curtailment of these essential activities results in denying to veterans the 'effective job counseling and placement service for veterans to assure a maximum of job opportunity in the field of gainful employment' as contemplated by the American Legion and as specifically provided by the Congress in the enactment of the Wagner-Peyser Act and title IV of the Legion's GI bill: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the American Legion in the Twenty-ninth Annual National Convention assembled in New York City, August 28–31, 1947, That we urge the Eightieth Congress immediately upon reconvening to adequately increase the appropriations for the State employment services where needed and for the United States Employment Service so as to provide for the employment of the required number of personnel and for all other necessary functions of these important services."

As hereinbefore reported it is imperative that the Wagner-Peyser Act of 1933 and title IV of the Legion's GI bill of 1944 be continued and strengthened if the veteran is to secure the full benefit of the employment services. Certain elements are urging the repeal or amendment of these acts. The Legion should emphatically oppose any such repeal or amendment. Resolution No. 826 covering the subject matter is recommended for approval and is as follows:

"Whereas it has always been the American Legion policy that the Federal Government has the responsibility for the maintenance of an adequate placement and job counseling service for veterans; and

"Whereas the Congress of the United States has acknowledged this responsibility by the enactment of two statutes, the Wagner-Peyser Act of 1933 and title IV of the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944, which statutes provided for a Nation-wide service for the employment of veterans through the United States Employment Service and the Veterans' Employment Service; and

"Whereas it is the established policy of the Federal Government to assume the responsibility for providing employment assistance and job counseling to veterans as enacted by legislation; and

"Whereas there has been a recent move to undermine the existing Federal-State system of employment services by proposals for basic modification or repeal of the Wagner-Peyser Act and title IV of the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the American Legion in the twenty-ninth annual national convention, assembled in New York, N. Y., August 28–31, 1947, oppose any efforts to change basically or repeal the Wagner-Peyser Act of 1933 or title IV of the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944, which will weaken or lessen the efforts of the Veterans' Employment Service, and recommends the maintenance of an adequately financed, independent operating agency, devoted exclusively to employment-service activities within the Federal department of the Government; that the Federal Government continue to resolve employment needs by 100-percent financial participation and support of public-employment-service programs operated by the State under Federal supervision, and that Government policy clearly establish and reiterate the priority of providing gainful employment to veterans in preference to unemployment compensation benefits of unemployment relief."

McKittrick Appointment Gives Bank of International Settlements Voice in ECA

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN A. BLATNIK

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. BLATNIK. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks, I include in the RECORD a letter dated July 13, 1948, and addressed to Mr. Paul G. Hoffman, Administrator of the Economic Cooperation Administration by the Society for the Prevention of World War III, Inc., protesting the appointment of Mr. Thomas McKittrick as Mr. Hoffman's chief advisor in financial and monetary matters. The Bank of International Settlements, which Mr. McKittrick headed as President throughout World War II, was an admitted instrument of the Nazi cartels, and served as their liaison with the international banking fraternity. The facts revealed in this letter give added significance to the choice of Mr. McKittrick to play a dominant and policy-making role in the Economic Cooperation Administration.

JULY 13, 1948.

Mr. PAUL G. HOFFMAN,
Administrator, Economic Cooperation Administration,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. HOFFMAN: As early supporters of the Marshall plan we have been following with great interest your courageous endeavors to help western Europe get on its feet. And believing as we do that it is everyone's duty to contribute his share to the success of the ECA, we feel constrained to make a few observations with regard to the recent appointment of Mr. Thomas McKittrick as your chief advisor in financial and monetary matters.

We fully realize that in selecting Mr. McKittrick you were, of course, guided by the idea of obtaining the best man—from the experts' point of view—for the job. No doubt Mr. McKittrick is an expert in financial matters, but there is also a moral problem involved in his case; namely, his wartime record and his past connections with the notorious Bank for International Settlements of Basle, Switzerland. The moral problem, in brief, is: Can a man who has been the servant throughout World War II of a German-controlled world institution serve faithfully the interests of western Europe—a western Europe which has suffered so much from the German economic, financial, and military aggression prior to and during World War II?

For our part we think not, and the following few facts culled from the official record will bear us out:

1. Mr. McKittrick was president of the Bank for International Settlements throughout World War II and was doing business with the Germans while our American boys were fighting the Germans." (From U. S. Treasury statement of Nov. 23, 1943.)

2. Ostensibly, the Bank for International Settlements was established in 1930 to service the obligations arising out of the Dawes and Young plans. Actually, however, the bank has been under the domination of Hjalmar Schacht and Sir Montagu Norman, former Governor of the Bank of England, who had done so much to help the Nazis prior to World War II.

3. During Mr. McKittrick's presidency of BIS, the bank was German-controlled to the extent of 72 percent, and the French, Dutch, Belgian, and Finnish directors were Nazi appointees.

4. Immediately after the outbreak of World War II, Switzerland began playing the role of the financial banker for Nazi Germany. The BIS distinguished itself for its services rendered to Germany under the presidency of Mr. Thomas McKittrick.

5. It is of record that with the outbreak of World War II, and especially since in 1942, large transfers of gold from occupied Europe were made by the Germans to the BIS.

6. The Allied Government knew the full extent of Germany's prewar holdings and, knowing the extent of all possible legitimate acquisitions of gold by Germany, openly warned BIS, as well as other Swiss banks, that the gold deposited by the Germans in Switzerland was looted from Germany's victims.

7. Although the directors of BIS were fully cognizant of the Allied warnings, they nevertheless continued to accept gold offered to them because they alleged the transfer of gold was legal and because they could not afford to hurt the stockholders of the bank.

8. Although the extent of the financial activities of BIS has always been shrouded in mystery, there is now ample evidence to prove—on the basis of documents found in Germany—that a large quantity of gold looted by the Nazis in occupied Europe was first resmelted in Berlin so as to obliterate all traces of non-German origin and subsequently shipped to BIS in Switzerland.

9. It is also known that some old German debts to various European countries were repaid during the war through BIS in gold, which was later stolen or confiscated from these countries by the Germans.

10. During World War II the BIS was strongly criticized by the Allied Governments for its activities in connection with accepting looted gold from the Reichsbank. Three years after VE-day, BIS has tacitly admitted that it had accepted looted gold, as witness the fact that the New York Times of May 15, 1948, reported that BIS has turned over to the Allied Governments $4,200,000 worth of gold inadvertently purchased during World War II. The meaning of the word "inadvertently" was not given by either the bank or the New York Times.

11. Despite this fact, and despite the fact that several governmental agencies and Congressmen have been clamoring for a thorough investigation of BIS, the bank has steadfastly refused the request for an investigation, claiming that under its statutes it is an international organization not subject to United States interference.

12. On July 20, 1944, at the meeting of Bretton Woods, a resolution was adopted that "No nation will be admitted to either the proposed international monetary fund or the Bank for International Reconstruction which has not previously broken with the Bank for International Settlements."

13. It was also decided at Bretton Woods that BIS should be liquidated. To the best of our knowledge, Mr. McKittrick has not done anything to implement the decisions of the Bretton Woods resolutions.

14. Despite this international condemnation of BIS, the United Press reported in 1944 Mr. McKittrick as having said the following: "We are keeping the machine ticking, because when the armistice comes, the former hostile powers will need an official instrument such as BIS."

15. We know of no better way to characterize BIS than to quote an excerpt from an article of the New York Times of May 19, 1943: "Allied preparations for an invasion of the European Continent make the Bank for International Settlements at Basle, Switzerland, look still more incongruous than it ever looked since the outbreak of the war in September 1939. In the seclusion of a Swiss city, American, German, French, and Italian bankers, not to mention Swedish, Swiss, and Netherlands representatives, are still at work side by side and attend to common business. Does it mean, that in this world of today, so hopelessly torn asunder, all belligerents are tacitly agreed to preserve a unique shelter for what was formerly called international finance, a shelter to be eventually used at will for the purpose of a policy of appeasement?"

All of the above statements can be substantiated by Government agencies. We believe that their gravity is self-evident, and that Mr. McKittrick is not morally qualified to be your adviser in any matter.

Equally self-evident, is, we feel, the fact that to give a collaborator like Mr. McKittrick such an important policy-making role in the ECA will be strongly resented by those recipients of ECA allocations who were Germany's victims.

Since so much is at stake, we respectfully urge your immediate consideration of this letter and your reconsideration of this appointment. We should be grateful for a reply, at your earliest convenience, and remain at your entire disposal for any assistance we are able to give you in this matter, as well as in all other matters pertaining to your splendid work.

Respectfully submitted.

SOCIETY FOR THE PREVENTION OF WORLD WAR III, INC.,
C. MONTEITH GILPIN, Secretary.

The Forgotten Veteran of 1948

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, of the thousands of appeals I received from veterans who are desperately trying to buy or rent a home, none has struck me so forcefully as that received from Mr. William F. Carlin, of Silver Spring, Md., president of the Veterans' Service Aid Council of Eastern Montgomery County, Md. He has summarized the distressing plight of veterans throughout the country who have been forced to live in temporary Government shacks, trailers, with in-laws and friends under "double up" and crowded conditions. I insert excerpts from Mr. Carlin's letter, as follows:

SILVER SPRING, MD.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN SABATH: This letter is addressed to you and all other Members of the Congress of the United States, in behalf of the forgotten man of 1948, the veteran of World War II whose income is in the lower bracket, under $3,500 per year, and who is desperately trying to buy or rent a home for his family. The appeal in this letter is also applicable to the nonveteran in the same bracket.

After reviewing the platform of each of the major political parties, adopted in the Philadelphia conventions, it is evident by the plank in each on housing that a large majority of the members of each party are sincerely interested in securing adequate housing for all, but it is further evident by the proposals set forth that the matter is being approached in so many different ways that the final solution adopted may not provide the speedy and satisfactory remedy that should be provided, due to the usual trading and compromising.

Conditions today are so desperate for those families whose wage-earners are in the wage bracket under $3,500 per year, in their efforts to buy or rent homes in the present highly inflated real estate market, that drastic and speedy action is absolutely necessary. Such action can only be secured through the Federal Government.

The reports of the Government housing agencies will probably show an increase in the amount of new housing construction, but an analysis of these reports will show that none of this construction is within the rental or purchasing means of the man earning $3,500 or less per year. Some within this wage bracket are renting and buying but, using the standard set up by mortgage loan agencies and banks, that 1 month's rent should not be any greater than 1 week's wages, it can be readily seen that many of these renters and purchasers are headed for grief. They are paying the high mortgage payments and rents now because they are desperate.

It is hoped that relief will be forthcoming from the special session of Congress called for July 26, so that veterans now living in temporary Government shacks or with their in-laws and friends may soon enjoy the comforts of real home life.

Assuring you that any contribution that you may make to the solution of this most vital problem, will be rewarded by the gratitude of thousands of almost homeless families, I am

Sincerely yours,

WM. F. CARLIN.

Mr. Speaker, the responsibility for the failure to pass legislation to relieve the almost homeless families of these veterans lies directly at the door of the Republican majority in Congress. As I have pointed out many times on this floor in the last 2 years the Republicans have succumbed to the pressure of the $5,000,000 real-estate lobby in killing the Taft-Ellender-Wagner housing bill which, if enacted, would have provided homes at prices or rentals that veterans and other homeless citizens could afford to pay. The Republicans have been subservient to the interests of the real-estate operators, mortgage-loan brokers, contractors and building-material suppliers and I urge the veterans and their families and low-income families to repudiate and vote against those Republican Senators and Representatives who have betrayed them in voting against their interests.

Sound Money or World Chaos—The Decision Is Up to the American People

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN SANBORN OF IDAHO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. SANBORN. Mr. Speaker, one of the greatest authorities on China affairs is Dr. Charles J. Fox, former editor and publisher of the North China Star and long-time resident of Tientsin. Lawyer, economist, and newspaperman, he is in Washington now pending the return of more settled times in China.

William Philip Simms, Scripps-Howard foreign editor, himself an old China hand, states the conclusions of Dr. Fox as follows:

> The one and only method by which the Chinese people can be saved from chaos is to help China return to her age-long silver standard unhampered by government restrictions.

Sound money is not only the problem of China but of the entire world, and the only solution is through a return to a monetary policy of bimetallism, with the prices of gold and silver pegged and permanently maintained at fixed and proper ratio as provided for in H. R. 7012 and S. 2895, and with currency made redeemable, at face value, on demand. The only possible argument left to the opponents of bimetallism is that old chestnut, the so-called Gresham's law which presupposes a preference for gold coins over silver coins. Naturally with the price of gold supported at a fixed price by Government and silver treated as a commodity subject to the manipulations of the international bankers, as has been the case since the demonitization of silver in 1873, people will prefer gold money. But with the price of both metals pegged at proper ratio, the parity between gold and silver will be maintained, gold and silver coins will be interchangeable and equally desirable, and there can be no preference.

During the first 80 years of our national existence, bimetallism was the monetary policy of our country, and no one can deny that we did mighty well with that kind of money. The crime of 1873 which resulted in the demonitization of silver was deliberately perpetrated by England, Germany, and the international bankers to exploit and pillage the silver-money countries of the Orient and the silver-producing countries of North and South America.

The United States escaped the fate of the other countries because of our system of free competitive enterprise and the tariff which protected the American market for American producers. But our progress was not nearly so great as it would have been under bimetallism, because the unsound monetary system resulting from the demonitization of silver brought about depressions like that of 1873, 1893, and 1929, and was responsible for both World War I and World War II. If we would end wars and depressions we must eliminate the causes, and return to a sound monetary policy.

Another old China hand is George E. Sokolsky who was one of the first reporters on the North China Star when that paper was started by Dr. Charles J. Fox. The following article by Mr. Sokolsky which appeared in the Washington Times-Herald of August 6, 1948, is most illuminating:

THESE DAYS

(By George Sokolsky)

Much of China's current troubles are monetary, arising from the debasement of her currency which was the direct result of the American silver policy. China's currency was based on silver, and the United States artificially raised the world price of silver in such a manner that that metal flowed into this country and left China with nothing but paper money.

This was as effective an attack upon China as anything the Japanese did during the entire fighting war.

Many of us so said at the time, although one of the arguments for this policy, out of which speculators made fortunes, was that it aided China.

The American Government sent experts to China to assist her in fiscal matters. The State Department and the Treasury were involved in this expert advice. Subsequently the United States sent other experts to China to advise Chiang Kai-shek on the conduct of the affairs of that country.

Among the advisers was Lauchlin Currie, Canadian born, who became one of President Roosevelt's anonymous secretaries, and is now on Miss Elizabeth Bentley's list of accused. I am not prejudging Mr. Currie's activities in China nor is it fair to accuse him of crimes of action or misdemeanors of judgment until all the evidence is in, including his own. But I call attention to the fact that this column has been critical of him, of Owen Lattimore, of General Stilwell, and George Marshall, and of John Carter Vincent, of the State Department, all so-called experts and authorities, for many years.

This is the time to make a full investigation of our relations with China on three questions:

1. Who was responsible for our silver policy; why did we undertake this utterly uneconomic business; who profited by it; what harm has it done to China?

2. What quantity of paper money was shipped from the United States to China; who printed that money; who placed the orders in this country; who instructed the flying of those bank notes over the hump while vital materials were delayed in Burma and India; who profited from these transactions; were they designed to aid China or so utterly to destroy her economy that the Communist—that is, the Russian—conquest of the country would become inevitable? Further, were payments for these bank notes, printed by a number of American firms and contracted for by Americans, paid out of Chinese funds or from funds borrowed from the United States? Were any American officials involved in this debasing transaction?

3. Why did we pursue a policy of trying to force Chiang Kai-shek to associate himself with the Chinese Communists in spite of the fact that we have in the records of the State Department, the Department of Commerce, Army and Navy intelligence, and the files of newspapers, ample evidence, from 1924 to 1948, of the effort of Soviet Russia to conquer China by means of the Chinese Communist Party? Why did the spokesmen of our Government try to give the impression that the Chinese Communists were not part of Soviet Russia's international apparatus, when since 1920 there has been a full record of the attendance of the Chinese Communists at every session of the third international, published in the Comintern paper, Inprecorr, giving their speeches, debates, discussions, and reports? Who ordered this false and malicious propaganda to be spread before the American people?

Why was this policy continued after Yalta where the Russians disclosed their purposes; after Potsdam which left nothing to the imagination; after the Russians seized Manchuria and half of Korea and broke all her treaties with us? Why was it pursued by the OWI, the OSS, the State Department, and even by George Marshall after the Russians had disclosed their aims in Asia? Who gave the orders?

If Congress will go to the roots of the matter, investigating these questions, the truth will disclose itself. And that truth will be that somewhere in the directing line, on the high level of policy, were powerful Americans who were working to hand China over to Soviet Russia, which would have given that country, in short time, the whole of Asia, and made America subject to Russia's will.

As previously stated, there is no doubt but that the majority of the Members of Congress who supported the Silver Purchase Act of 1934 sincerely believed that they were helping China, but it was much like locking the barn door after the horse was stolen, and the results were much as Mr. Sokolsky has written.

In 1844 England pegged the price of gold at the equivalent in American money of $20.67. This was achieved by buying in unlimited quantities all gold offered at that price and selling in unlimited quantities all gold on demand at the same price, plus only a small handling charge. The United States and all other countries accepted the price set by England, and since we had previously—in 1837—fixed the ratio between silver and gold at 16 to 1, this gave silver a price of $1.29, which prevailed until silver was demonetized in 1873.

Because gold could not be coined in small denominations, most of the money of the people was silver, while gold had a tendency to accumulate in the banks and in hands of the wealthy. Thus, silver might be designated as the poor man's money. When silver was demonetized the price of silver depreciated. Before demonetization an ounce of silver bought a bushel of wheat, which set the price of wheat at approximately $1.29. After demonetization an ounce of silver still bought a bushel of wheat, but since the price of silver speedily depreciated to 60 cents per ounce, the price of wheat was 60 cents. This wrecked agriculture in England, just as it did in the United States, as records of the 1890's show.

In the late 1920's great cargoes of wheat and flour were shipped to China from our Pacific Northwest, and similar cargoes of cotton were shipped from our Southern States. Then silver money was withdrawn from circulation in India, and this silver dumped on the world market. The price of silver dropped from 65 cents per ounce to 26 cents per ounce. This trade in wheat, flour, and cotton ended overnight, for the drop in silver had wiped out 60 percent of the purchasing power of 1,000,000,000 people in the Orient. You cannot destroy the purchasing power of half the people in the world without a world-wide depression, and the panic and depression of 1929 was the result.

A return to bimetallism would have brought an end to the 1929 depression in a few months, but the American people had been so thoroughly inoculated with foreign "isms" and ideologies that they blamed the depression on President Hoover, the tariff, and American capitalism. This led to the venture in "managed currency"—irredeemable paper money. Other countries followed our lead, and since they were no longer required to redeem their currency in gold, they sold their gold at $35 per ounce to the United States, and we stored it in a cave at Fort Knox where it is performing no useful service. China soon followed our lead in "managed currency" and since her money was no longer redeemable in silver, she sold us her silver. And since China's money is no longer redeemable in silver, her dollars have dropped from a value of 30 cents in American money in 1935 to 10 million for one American dollar in 1948. China's experience is an extreme example of what may be expected in any country that operates on a managed-currency basis.

However, two powerful groups in the world are all out for a managed currency—the Marxists and the Rhodesians—the former the followers of Karl Marx and the latter the followers of Cecil Rhodes. An example of what Marxism means is now evident in Soviet Russia, while the Rhodes ideology is being put into operation by the "fund" which was set up under the Bretton Woods monetary agreements. Rhodes visioned a series of cartels and monopolies in the hands of a powerful few who would control all raw products, production, distribution, and prices—a financial superstate. The "fund" is already taking on the power of such a state where paper money issued by it, or with its approval, need not be redeemable.

WARNING TO GOLD PRODUCERS

Bimetallism is just as much your fight as it is the fight of the silver producers and the believers in sound, dependable, redeemable currency. Unless currency is backed by adequate reserves of gold and silver and made redeemable in those metals, gold will soon be valued only for its industrial use which is practically nil, and the United States Government will suffer huge losses on its gold holdings; for the internationalists of one-world persuasion, whether they be followers of Karl Marx or Cecil Rhodes, are determined to set up a one-world superstate in which the United States will be reduced to the status of a Balkan satrapy.

Those who are suffering under the delusion that a return to bimetallism with gold and silver pegged at prices set out in my bill will cause gold and silver to flow into the United States Treasury are sadly mistaken. Exactly the reverse will occur; there will be a mad rush by other countries to buy our gold and silver to back up their own lagging currency. Billions of dollars in gold and silver now in hiding in many parts of the world will flow back into the banks of the various countries and serve as a 40-percent monetary reserve for the issuance of stable, dependable currency.

Some of them may have to borrow gold and silver from us for such reserves, but naturally such loans will be only 40 percent of what we are now loaning them under the present unsound managed-currency system; and we would have a reasonable chance of having such loans repaid because the world would be on its way back to economic stability and peace, and communism would die on the vine.

Sound money means economic freedom; a managed currency means economic bondage and world chaos.

DO NOT BE TOO BOASTFUL ABOUT OUR NATIONAL INCOME

President Truman, Senator BARKLEY, and other members of the Democratic administration have made much of the fact that we now have a national income of approximately $210,000,000,000, and like to compare it with the national income when the New Deal came into power. They fail to say, however, that because of the unsound "managed currency" currency policy of the New Deal, the dollar has been so depreciated that $210,000,000,000 today is equivalent to only $115,000,000,000 in 1939 and $78,000,000,000 when the New Deal came into power in 1933.

In view of the fact that this policy of "managed currency" is being perpetuated in its most vicious form under the Bretton Woods monetary agreements, our delegates to Bretton Woods should frankly admit that they were suckered into supporting these agreements by Lord John Maynard Keynes, Henry Morgenthau, Harry D. White, Dean Acheson, and Nathan Gregory Silvermaster, and do the best they can to undo the evil they afflicted on their country; for the Bretton Woods monetary agreements were particularly designed to sell America down the river.

Government Grain Buying Caused Higher Domestic Food Prices

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, from July 1, 1946, to June 30, 1947, the Commodity Credit Corporation, the food-buying agency of the Government, purchased in the domestic market the following large quantities of grain: Wheat and flour, 268,000,000 bushels; corn, 75,613,878 bushels; barley, 21,406,572 bushels; oats, 8,414,604 bushels; and grain sorghums 2,395,000 bushels.

From July 1, 1947 to June 30, 1948, the Commodity Credit Corporation purchased in the domestic market the following large quantities of grain: Wheat and flour 390,200,000 bushels; barley 9,560,109 bushels; oats 7,162,947 bushels; grain sorghums 6,151,947 bushels; and rye 912,460 bushels.

During 1946–47 commercial interests, under export allocations from the Government, purchased 133,600,000 bushels of wheat and wheat flour, and for 1947–48 wheat and wheat flour in an amount of 105,800,000 bushels.

The Government has been, and still is, the largest single grain buyer in the country. As I have said before, the Government dominates the market price. When the Government buys in large quantity, the price goes up, and when it curtails or stops buying the price goes down. The price paid by the Government over the 2-year period for the wheat purchased, ranged from less than $2 per bushel to more than $3.25. These large purchases of grain have had a terrific impact upon the cost of vital food to American consumers. Price advances in grain caused higher prices for feed used in the production of meat, poultry, and dairy products. This meant higher prices for meat, dairy, and poultry products to consumers.

Although these purchase programs were authorized, the Truman administration should be frank enough to admit that the buying of such large amounts of grain were, at least, partly responsible for higher cost of food to the American people.

TOTAL FOOD AND AGRICULTURAL EXPORTS

For the year 1946–47 there was exported from the United States 19,200,000 long tons of food valued at $2,758,000,000, other agricultural products, mostly cotton and tobacco, 1,400,000 long tons valued at $1,000,000,000, making a total tonnage for 1946–47 of 20,600,000 long tons, valued at $3,758,000,000.

The preliminary estimates for food and other agricultural exports for the year 1947–48 are calculated at 19,000,000 long tons of food, and 1,000,000 long tons of other agricultural products, mostly cotton and tobacco, having an estimated total value of $3,441,604,000.

The export figures above mentioned and values are estimates of the Department of Agriculture.

A large proportion of the above exports for the 2-year period, valued at $7,199,604,000, were paid for by the American taxpayers. In my opinion, American consumers were taxed twice for these exported agricultural products. First, in taxes paid to the Federal Government and, secondly, in being forced to pay higher prices for the food and other products purchased by them for home consumption.

SHALL IT BE TOBACCO OR FOOD FOR HUNGRY PEOPLE?

Several hundred million pounds of tobacco will be donated by American taxpayers to the countries coming under the Truman-Marshall plan. Many Americans want to know the reason. They are willing to help feed hungry people. They cannot understand why it is necessary to donate both food and tobacco. Well, my friends, hungry people do not get the food or tobacco unless they pay their own governments for it.

The United States News of May 7, 1948, tells the story of how the British Government will profit from our tobacco gift. The United States Government makes a gift of $119,000,000 worth of tobacco to the British Government. The British Government sells this $119,000,000 worth of tobacco to the British people at high prices and realizes $2,500,000,000 in profit from our tobacco gift. What do we get? Maybe, a thank you. Let the United States News tell the story, which seems and is fantastic, as follows:

SURPRISE USES OF THE DOLLARS GIVEN TO EUROPE

Marshall plan dollars, starting to flow, are to have some strange and interesting effects.

Tobacco from United States is to help balance budgets, help fight inflation, provide profits to tax.

Taxpayers have yet to learn the uses for all their dollars.

Some strange and interesting results are to flow from the billions of dollars in aid that the United States is giving to nations of Europe. Results are not all to be of the kind that taxpayers may have thought about when putting up the money.

Tobacco, for example, is to play an important part in the reconstruction of Europe. Congress decided that Europe should get 458,000,000 pounds of United States tobacco in the first year of the Marshall plan, or about 2 pounds for each man, woman, and child in the cooperating countries.

Surprising events are to flow from that fact. Britain, to illustrate, is down for 218,260,000 pounds of tobacco, or about 5 pounds per person. This tobacco costs around $119,000,000, an important part of which is met by United States taxpayers, who contribute the tobacco. The British Government, taking the tobacco, imposes an import tax of $11.74 per pound.

All of a sudden the $119,000,000 worth of United States tobacco becomes the equivalent of $2,500,000,000 to the British Government for budget-balancing purposes. The tobacco, given by the United States, is sold for pounds to the processor, by the British Government, at the Government's price plus the import duty. The processor, in turn, sells to the distributor, who sells to the public.

In starting this train of events the United States taxpayer, contributing tobacco, does many things. He takes surplus tobacco off the hands of United States tobacco growers so that the price at home can be held up. He gives the British Government tobacco that it can use to draw a very large amount of money out of the pockets of the British people. He enables the tobacco processor and distributor in Britain to realize profits of their own. And he gives the Briton a smoke.

A Briton pays the equivalent of 70 cents for a package of cigarettes that costs 15 cents in the United States. He pays for tobacco that, as likely as not, was given to his Government by the United States taxpayer in the interest of European reconstruction.

What happens in Britain is to happen in varying degree in France, Belgium, Ireland, Netherlands, Denmark, Italy, western Germany. Tobacco contributed by the United States is helping to balance budgets, to dampen inflation, to satisfy people.

The Real Issues—Republicans Will Again Attempt To Mislead the People

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, the record shows that the Republicans have deliberately and willfully refused to carry out the promises they made to the people in 1946 to bring about lower prices and to enact legislation to provide homes at prices people of lower income can afford to rent. To divert attention from the dangerous reactionary and Fascist activities of special interests and lobby groups whose interests they served in this Congress in passing or not passing legislation that enabled them to reap huge profits from the American consumer they are attempting to drag a red herring across the path of realities in the hope of again confusing and misleading the people in the forthcoming campaign. So the Republican high command, with the full cooperation of the National Association of Manufacturers and the $5,000,000 real-estate lobby, have planned a campaign of inspired investigations of Government officials and employees to detract from their failure to arrest or lower prices, and to cover their action in killing the Taft-Ellender-Wagner housing bill.

The Republicans have kept one promise made by the Republican Speaker, Mr. MARTIN, when he declared that "the Congress will open with a prayer and close with a probe." But instead of having your five investigating committees probe the high cost of living and how the real-estate lobby expended millions of dollar to kill the Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill, these committees started to investigate alleged frauds and delinquencies of the bureaucrats. However, these investigations were discontinued when it was learned that all of these so-called bureaucrats, contractors, and manufacturers, who have been and are contributing to your campaign funds, were Republicans. These preliminary investigations disclosing members of their own party involved caused these committees to change front and their publicity experts began feeding the Republican-controlled press with a lot of balderdash, hokum, and bunk by using self-confessed Communists and communistic spies whose allegations could not be considered in any real American court to create hysteria and smear patriotic, loyal, and honorable American citizens, many of whom served their country with fidelity and distinction during the late war.

GRAND JURY FOUND EVIDENCE INSUFFICIENT

Mr. Speaker, yes; these committees have been investigating what has been known to the Federal Bureau of Investigation and other Government intelligence services for a long time. These innuendos and accusations have been sifted for an entire year by a Federal grand jury which after hearing more than 200 witnesses, came to the conclusion that none of the men under investigation were guilty of the charges made by the miserable, self-confessed Communists, who are shamefully given greater credence by these committees than are proved, loyal outstanding Americans.

These investigations are aided by members of the old America First Committee, the war subversives and seditionists who formerly served under the murderous Hitler-Bundist agents, George Sylvester Vierieck and Fritz Kuhn, the stooges of Pelley, now serving time in a Federal penitentiary, and by those persons subservient to the reactionary forces protecting the menacing Fascist activities in the United States, most of whom may be identified as smear and mud-slinging specialists and character assassins.

These scurrilous propagandists have not only been attacking Democratic candidates and those of a liberal point of view, but also those who have expressed and indicated their preference and support of human rights as against property rights, and now they are including and directing their attacks against labor leaders and honest advocates of the rights of the people.

No one will deny that the investigative personnel of J. Edgar Hoover's organization, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, our Military and Naval Intelligence, Treasury Intelligence, and our Secret Service are far superior in ability and intelligence to any Russian intelligence or investigative group or to an investigative committee. It is to be especially noted that over the years none of these outstanding Government investigating agencies has been used in witchhunt investigations and their reports never have been of the persecutory or character-assassin kind. But today we find five Republican political investigations in full sway under authority of the Congress delegated to its standing or special investigating committees which are costing the Government additional millions of dollars.

REPUBLICANS ATTEMPT TO DISTRACT ATTENTION FROM THEIR FAILURES

The fact is that you Republicans in desperation are devoting yourselves through the instrumentalities of these congressional investigating committees to aiding the former Bundists-Fascists to distract attention from your failure to legislate in the interest of the people and from the ever-increasing danger of war mongers and war profiteers, and the reactionary, dangerous Fascist groups, but you cannot, with all your wealth, ingenuity, and falsehoods, emanating from the National Association of Manufacturers, your politically controlled newspapers, and your outstanding Republican spokesmen avoid your responsibility for the unconscionable high cost of living and the lack of proper and adequate housing.

The reckless, reprehensible, inexcusable smearing and mud slinging of these committees, staffed by men not possessing judicial minds, according to two of the most political-minded and active Members, is having a negative effect on informed American minds, who denounce it as untruthful, unwarranted, and un-American.

This assailing, attacking, and smearing policy is nothing new to the Republican politicians who are supported by the avaricious and predatory special and vested interests, by the capitalists and the Fascist-minded gentlemen of Wall Street. They are masters at that ignoble art.

Time will not permit me to call attention to the vicious, unmanly, and outrageous attacks that have been made on all our Democratic Presidential candidates. However, I would briefly remind that George Washington was said to be a hyena; Jefferson was charged with being anti-Christian and a Jacobin; John Adams was attacked as an illegitimate brat of a Scotch peddler; John Quincy Adams was called deceitful and a beggar; Andrew Jackson not only was attacked in a most outrageous manner, but even his wife was smeared and her reputation ruined. Presidents Wilson and Roosevelt were even ignobly persecuted beyond the grave.

These attacks were made by the old Whigs or reactionaries and today, not only have you Republicans untruthfully assailed, smeared, and tried to destroy the splendid record of the Democratic Presidential candidate, but you have without exception attacked all progressive Democrats and New Dealers who are fighting for the cause of the common man and who cannot be controlled by the trusts, combines, vested interests, and malefactors of great wealth.

THE PEOPLE WILL HAVE THE REAL FACTS AND TRUTH

The American people should have all the real facts and truth. With them they will reach an accurate conclusion. The statements made on the floor and publicized in the Republican-controlled press that the two makeshift bills passed in this Congress will reduce the high cost of living, aid in the construction of lower-cost homes, and arrest inflation are obviously false because:

First, the price-control law was repealed and instead of price control you enacted legislation in this Congress giving the industries of our country the right to voluntarily fix prices because they promised to lower the price of food as well as other commodities provided that price controls and the other restrictions were removed. As everyone must know, industry has not reduced the price of its commodities, but, on the contrary, has been and still is increasing prices notwithstanding that it is making the greatest profits in history. The statement that the President has the power under the two new makeshift bills to reduce the high cost of living, as I have stated, is erroneous. So is the statement that the high cost of living is due to our exporting policy. Our exports of last year amounted to only 4 percent and this year it is contemplated that we will export only 2½ percent of our production, yet our warehouses are bulging with surpluses and we will have the greatest crops of wheat, corn, and cotton in the history of our country. Consequently, if we export 2½ percent of our tremendous surpluses this year no one can truthfully maintain that our policy of exporting is responsible for the increasing cost of food.

Second, it is preposterous and ridiculous to think that one-seventh or one-eighth of 1 percent interest charge increase will arrest inflation. On the contrary, this increase will enable the bankers to charge the Government higher interest so it is in their interest that this legislation was passed.

Third, the makeshift bill passed by this Congress does not give the President the power to reduce prices on meats and foods, or to provide for the building of lower-cost homes because, as I said before, you Republicans have given the manufacturers, the builders, the producers, and the avaricious combines and business the right to voluntarily fix prices—and how they have been and are fixing them—not downward but higher and higher. The only way we can obtain cheaper homes is by price control of building materials as the evidence discloses that since the removal of priorities and repeal of price controls the cost of all steel products, lumber, cement and, in fact, of all building materials have increased from 100 percent to 200 percent. With the statistics and reports of the Bureau of Labor Statistics and the Federal Reserve showing that wages increased 6 percent in that period and profits of manufacturing corporations increased 60 percent in the same period, this outrageous increase in the cost of building materials cannot be justified. The Republican majority was fully informed of these facts by the Joint Housing Committee that spent $100,000, yet it sat supinely by with evidence on every hand that the building-material manufacturers had not even attempted to voluntarily fix prices, much less to arrest or control the skyrocketing prices. The real estate lobby, spearheaded by three national real estate associations, has been active in Washington in opposing housing legislation. Its lobbying expenditures has reached the staggering sum of $5,600,000. Their top lobbyists draw salaries up to $25,000 a year, plus expenses. The activities of one of the associations is conducted from quarters renting at $600 a month and among the expense items reported is one for "Christmas gratuities" to key hotel personnel, and another for membership dues at the Congressional Country Club for a Nareb official. Yes, the real estate lobby left no stone unturned in "influencing legislation" by entertainment and otherwise, and particularly to defeat the Taft-Ellender-Wagner housing bill.

I repeat, in a desperate effort to distract the attention of the American voters from your guilt and responsibility for the high cost of living and your failure to provide for lower-cost homes, you are covering the front pages of the newspapers with propaganda as to alleged revelations of these congressional investigations that are being conducted by five different committees at the expense of the taxpayers.

You are standing before hungry and homeless men and women offering loyalty tests, yourselves as shields between an alleged endangered America and good citizenship in substitution for absolute necessities of life.

Instead of feeding the people with cheaper food, you Republicans are feeding them with cheap, fantastic stories of communism, communistic spies, and American traitors while those connected with the Bundists and Fascist forces are under your own inspiration, smearing and discrediting outstanding loyal American citizens by unfair and un-American methods.

Address of Hon. William L. Dawson, of Illinois, at the Democratic National Convention

OF
HON. WILLIAM L. DAWSON
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. DAWSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include a speech made by me at the Democratic National Convention, July 14, 1948:

Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the convention, for four consecutive times now the people of this great Nation have marched to the polls in overwhelming numbers, have put their stamp of approval upon the principles, platforms, and candidates represented to them by the Democratic Party in conventions. Sixteen years ago, in 1932, at a time when 12 previous years of Republican rule under Harding, Coolidge, Hoover, had reduced this country from a prosperous, powerful, and progressive Nation to a depression-ridden land, cursed with closed banks, closed factories, and closed businesses, and plagued by poverty, want, unemployment, and hunger; a land where untold thousands ate in bread lines, soup kitchens, and slept in police stations, garages, and public buildings for want of a place to call home; at a time when veterans who had fought and won World War I stood on street corners selling apples and marched to Washington to beg for a bonus only to be fired upon in the Nation's Capital—in these dark hours of distress, the American people turned to our party. They endorsed the principles, platforms, and candidates presented at our Democratic Convention. President Franklin D. Roosevelt, backed up by a Democratic-controlled Congress stepped into that Republican-made mess—with the battle cry, "the American people have nothing to fear except fear itself"—steps were taken to restore the confidence of the American people in themselves and in their country; the pump of industry and business was primed with Government dollars placed in the hands of citizens to pay for work done in place of a dole bestowed as ignoble charity. With confidence restored and dignity restored, the Nation was soon embarked on the road to real economic recovery.

Again in 1936 the people approved of the results of the Democratic Convention and kept in power a Democratic administration which continued to bring to this people benefits never before enjoyed by the rank and file of the working masses of our citizens. Humanity in government became the slogan. The status of those who live by the sweat of their brows was changed and the working man and woman assumed a dignity never before enjoyed. The right of collective bargaining was granted and as a result thereof workers took on a more important role in the industrial life of our country. The masses of citizens enjoyed a prosperity never before had in this or any other country.

In 1940, when war clouds gathered on the horizon and the forces of aggression and bigotry threatened to destroy the peace and prosperity of the world, the people once more put their stamp of approval upon the actions taken at our Democratic Convention and though it meant the breaking of an unwritten law and the destruction of a precedent, President Roosevelt was elected to a third term and a Democratic administration was called upon to meet the danger. War did break out. From a state of unpreparedness occasioned by the destruction of our powerful Navy of World War I and the effects of a depression created by a Republican regime, America speedily became the arsenal of the world on every front—on land, in the air, and on and under the sea—wherever the enemy could be found our men of every race, creed, and color, our planes, our tanks, our arms and equipment engaged the foe.

Again in 1944, in the midst of this most devastating holocaust of war, when on a thousand battlefields in every part of the world, millions of our youth, both men and women, fought a cruel and ruthless foe bent on destroying all free peoples and all democratic ways of life, the American people again embraced our principles, platforms, and candidates presented to them by our Democratic Convention. In a record-shattering election they chose Franklin D. Roosevelt for a fourth term for President and Harry S. Truman for Vice President. The tempo of war increased. Burdened by the exacting duties of President, worn by the responsibilities of a terrible war, and with ultimate victory in the offing, President Franklin D. Roosevelt laid down his shield and sword and went to meet his Maker.

Like Moses, who led his people within sight of the promised land and was not permitted to enter, so Roosevelt led the democracies of the world within sight of victory and was called to his reward. Harry S. Truman stepped into the Presidency in the midst of a war. His was the decision to be made on whether we should continue to risk the rigors of prolonged strife or whether we should bring it to a quick end by using for the final blow the greatest device ever conceived and created by man—the atomic bomb. Believing in the justness of our cause, realizing the price in human life and suffering we had paid and were paying in a war that was not of our choosing, and sustained by the conviction that his course was right, he gave the word to act. The entire civilized world stood aghast while an erstwhile savage foe shrank in terror and dismay and quickly sought the security of surrender. Victory was ours. Many millions of mothers sighed in relief, and many millions of enslaved persons all over the world saw a ray of hope, other millions of displaced persons sought a haven.

The problems of peace are often more harrowing than those of war. Under the impelling force of common danger, people oftimes bear the inconveniences and restraints of war without complaining. With the removal of the danger each person wants for himself quickly and speedily the removal of every inconvenience. With the victory won, Harry S. Truman turned to the problems of peace. Courageously he sought to gradually remove the war restraints during the process of gearing our wartime production to peacetime production. He worked with the leaders of our allies to establish a strong United Nations Organization to work for peace in the world. He has established a program for world rehabilitation which will preserve the integrity of the nations of western Europe and put them on a self-sustaining basis which will assure markets for goods produced in our great factories.

Repeatedly President Truman recommended the enactment of legislation for the relief of the small wage earner from the burden of wartime taxation; for the widening of social-security coverage to include many other classes of wage earners; for the establishment of a health program for the protection of every citizen; for the broadening of educational facilities to the end that no child shall be denied the opportunity of getting an education; for the promotion of a building program which would assure every veteran a home and which would put adequate housing within reach of low wage earners at a price they can afford to pay.

Smarting under the restrictions of wartime controls and lulled into a state of complacency, the people in 1946 elected a Republican-controlled Congress. Immediately the forces of reaction got to work. The labor-baiting Taft-Hartley law passed, hamstringing labor; veterans' benefits were shelved; slum clearance and a low-cost housing program were stopped; the world rehabilitation program was badly sabotaged; social-security benefits were curtailed and price controls were removed before a transition had been made from wartime to peacetime production. Already prices have soared sky high and the cost of living reached an all-time high; food prices are up beyond belief and are still rocketing upward; rent controls have been weakened at a time of the greatest housing shortage in our history. Valiantly during the last 2 years, President Truman and a liberal Democratic minority fought to maintain a sound domestic economy, one which would keep prices at a level commensurate with the prevailing wage scale; they fought to protect the workingman's savings which he had accumulated during the war, to protect the benefits gained by labor under 14 years of Democratic rule; they sought to provide a home for the veteran and adequate housing for all. Again and again and again President Truman has stood in the breach in support of Democratic principles in our Democratic platform. Many, many times he has used the influence of his office and the power of the Presidential veto to turn back the Republican forces of reaction. He has courageously and unequivocally advocated that laws be enacted to assure to every citizen the rights guaranteed by our Constitution, that freedom and liberty, and security in life and property, and the right to work and the right to vote are the sacred heritage of every person.

The Republican Party is now and has been during your lifetime and mine the party of the favored few. Those who place the acquisition and protection of wealth above the attainment of human rights. The Republican Party is the vehicle used by the great corporations to protect profits and to get more. It is the party of low wages and huge profits. It has spent millions to control the sources of information going to the people.

The Democratic Party is the party of the people; the party of the millions of little people who work; they are of every race and creed and nationality that have attained citizenship in this great American melting pot. Some of them may have seemingly conflicting interests but all of them have one thing in common—a Democratic victory is an assurance that the forces of government will not be used against them in their quest for enjoyment of the benefits afforded by this great democracy.

For 16 years the Democratic Party has led this Nation through the vicissitudes of peace and war and today we stand as the most prosperous, the most powerful, and the most advanced nation in the world. This Nation is the acknowledged leader among the nations of the world. Our people live on a scale not enjoyed by the people of any other nation. Are we Democrats in convention here assembled today prepared to surrender the reins of government to the reactionary party of Harding and Coolidge and Hoover to be once again exploited? Do we want again in this country bread lines and soup kitchens and veterans selling apples? Do we want to go back to the days of low wages and unemployment?

Already in 2 years a Republican Congress has laid the foundation for the next depression. High prices are fast consuming the savings of millions of working people. When their money is gone then comes the lay-off, the return to lower wages, then the pitting of laboring man against laboring man and the effort to get any kind of job at any wage in order to feed their families. Whom have they got to beat us? We licked their nominee 4 years ago and can do it again. He is the same man surrounded by the same old gang. The Republicans may have the money, the press, and the radio, but the Democratic Party has the people. Let's pit our manpower against their dollars. Men and women can vote—dollars cannot. The millions of little people know what they want. They want our Democratic President and a Democratic Congress. The newspaper, the radio, corporations, and big business have been against our candidates ever since a Democratic President pulled them out of the depression and saved their hides and their fortunes. They were all against Roosevelt in 1940 and they were against Roosevelt in 1944. The people are sorry now that they grew careless in 1946. They voted then against restraints and not against the Democratic Party. This year 1948 is national election year. Our record of liberalism and humanity in government is written. We have the men who help to make it.

Democrats of America, let's close ranks. Let's present to the electorate from this convention those principles of liberalism and humanity in government, backed up by a platform of domestic progress and international cooperation for peace and world freedom, supported by candidates who have already played a part in guiding the Nation to its present place of power and influence. If we do this the people will once again rally to our banner and victory will be ours in November.

The Facts on the Republican Killing of the Taft-Ellender-Wagner Housing Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, under the leave given me, I insert an article by Thomas L. Stokes, one of the most outstanding factual writers of today, appearing in the Washington News of August 3, 1948, which gives the low-down on the Republican legislative action that killed the consideration of the Taft-Ellender-Wagner housing bill. The article entitled "T-E-W as an Eample," clearly sets forth the case history of the proposed legislation which, if enacted, would have enabled distressed veterans and other citizens to buy or rent homes for their families at prices and on terms which they could afford to pay. The responsibility for the killing of this much-needed legislation, despite the appeals of homeless veterans and citizens of moderate income, is placed squarely on the Republican Congress and its membership can expect a proper accounting from those whom they failed in the November election. Mr. Stokes' article is as follows:

T-E-W AS AN EXAMPLE

(By Thomas L. Stokes)

What is happening—or not happening—on the Taft-Ellender-Wagner long-range housing bill at the special session of Congress shows how a handful of powerful key figures can manipulate the machinery of Congress in favor of big special interests to defeat the popular will.

It is an excellent case history, as well, of the Eightieth Congress and its approach to major problems affecting the general public welfare. It is herewith spelled out for the enlightenment and guidance of the public.

The Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill passed the Senate April 28, 2 months before the end of the regular session and finally was approved by the proper legislative committee of the House, the Banking and Currency Committee.

The layman might logically think that approval by the proper legislative committee would send the bill to the floor for a vote. But not so.

With eight of its dozen members voting, the Rules Committee then politely tabled the measure, 6 to 2.

So today we have the irony of a little group of men in the House blocking action on a measure designed to relieve the distressing housing shortage despite its approval by the Senate, by the proper House legislative committee, and despite support by a majority of Members of the House who cannot get a chance to vote on it in the democratic fashion.

Veterans and other people with inadequate housing, can complain all they please, but they can't reach this little group of self-ordained bosses.

The real-estate lobby, which bitterly fought the bill all the way and lost every round up to the Rules Committee, finally won its way when it reached the little group.

This lobby, like other special-interest lobbies, can work its way in Congress because of the difficulty of the public to fix responsibility, to find the culprit in the legislative maze.

Then, there is not only the Rules Committee, which is subservient to other lobbies, but there is the Republican-Southern Democratic coalition. The T-E-W bill, when it was passed by the Senate 2 years ago, likewise was blocked in the House, then under Democratic control. Most southern conservative Democrats in the Senate voted this year, too, to eliminate the public-housing features of the bill, joining a number of Republicans in an unsuccessful move in that body.

While the housing bill carries all sorts of assistance to private builders, the real-estate interests are ired over the provisions for loans and grants to local housing authorities to clear slums and build low-cost rental housing for low-income groups, even this is restricted to projects that private builders cannot undertake.

The reluctance in Congress now toward the T-E-W public housing, which is on a limited basis, is hard to understand, for it approved the principle in the 1937 Housing Act.

Address of Hon. John R. Steelman

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. EDWARD G. ROHRBOUGH

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 31, 1948

Mr. ROHRBOUGH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to revise and extend my remarks, I include therein an address delivered by the Honorable John R. Steelman, the Assistant to the President of the United States.

This address was delivered before the governors of the Southern States and is a very strong argument in favor of Federal aid to education. It follows:

The President has asked me to convey to you his personal greetings and his best wishes for a successful and constructive meeting.

To meet with the governors of the Southern States is a pleasant experience for me. In the past 3 years I have talked with officials of nearly every Southern State concerning some of their problems.

I wish more people in other sections of our country understood more fully, and appreciated as I do, the preeminent qualities and potentialities of the South. We do not hear enough about the new South—about its culture, its growing industrialization, its rapid increases in wealth, and the steady improvement in educational opportunity.

It is through the work of enlightened groups here and elsewhere that an atmosphere of better understanding can be created. This group, meeting tonight, was organized with that purpose, among others, in mind. Through your joint efforts you advance the cause of your individual States. But even more, you serve as a cohesive force in American life. The Council of State Governments has performed a valuable service not alone on behalf of the various interests of the individual States but on behalf of the broader interests of the people. Here in the South that same type of service has been performed—and is possible on a still greater scale—through your fine work in the southern governors' conference.

You have met here to discuss some of the problems that today confront the State governments. But all of us are made aware every day that there are very few problems that are confined to the State governments alone. We must think of Federal, State, and local governments together, for together they make up our American system of government—a system of multiple governments for a single nation.

The problems that confront State governments usually confront Federal and local governments, too. The great need now and in the future is for all three types of government to work together, to cooperate toward our common objectives of providing for the national defense and the general welfare of our people. I know this is the approach of President Truman.

There are, of course, points of disagreement between the State and Federal Governments, just as there are between State and local governments. Such disagreements may provide headlines in the newspapers and make life interesting. Unfortunately, they often overshadow such fine achievements as we have made working together in programs like public roads, public health, agriculture, and many others.

But the basic job of cooperation toward common goals is fundamental. We must constantly seek better ways of working together.

Tonight I should like to speak of some specific areas in which the Federal and State Governments are jointly interested and need to act cooperatively.

I select these subjects because I am sure they are of immediate interest to you, and because I have been privileged to gain a more intimate understanding of some of the problems connected with them.

GENERAL EDUCATION

The first subject I wish to discuss is that of education.

If America is to survive and prosper in this complex postwar world, we must demonstrate that we can make our form of democracy function. We must make sure that our political, economic, and social system is not static but is flexible enough to meet the needs of our people. We must always move forward toward the full realization of the ideals which are the spiritual foundation of our American society. "To preserve our democracy, we must improve it."

The best way to improve our democracy in the long run is to make sure that our children are well educated. Our schools teach what democracy is, why it is important, and why it requires each citizen to take part in the work and life of the Nation.

Our children are facing a tremendously complex world. Serious economic and social problems inside and outside our country require solution. The best possible training and education will be needed to enable them to achieve peace and happiness.

As a Nation, we have long recognized the basic importance of education. We have been moving forward toward the goal of education for all. In 1870 there were only 80,000 students in all our high schools. In 1940 there were more than 7,000,000. In 1870 there were 60,000 in our colleges, while in 1940 there were 1,500,000 students. In those 70 years while our population went up 3 times, the number in secondary schools went up 90 times and the number in colleges 25 times.

At the present time we are having an extraordinary increase in the number of children reaching school age, as a result of the high birth rate in recent years.

Thus the clear goal before us is to provide better and better education for more children.

Let us consider first the problem of elementary and secondary schools. There seem to be three major difficulties to be overcome. One is primarily a State problem. That is the problem of better organization—better organization of State education departments, in some States, and better organization of school districts which are economically sound and able to finance a more adequate school program.

The other two major difficulties facing elementary and secondary education need to be considered by both Federal and State governments. One is the problem of attracting and holding enough competent teachers. The other is the question of replacement and new construction of school buildings.

Both of these problems force us to face the hard facts of Government finance. To recruit more and better teachers, we must pay them salaries that come somewhere near meeting the competition of jobs in private industry and in other types of Government service. To repair and build schools requires a heavy investment of funds particularly in view of the present high construction and maintenance costs.

In the face of these high costs, the State governments have provided more money for education, even though their general financial situation is not an easy one.

There is another important financial fact in this picture. The ability of States to pay for adequate schools is by no means uniform, because income and wealth in this country are not uniformly distributed. Accordingly, many States have to tax their people and their business very heavily in order to provide a standard of education that other States can afford with much lower taxes.

We know that the States have done a remarkable job in the last few years in increasing funds for education. We also know that some of the States with the most limited taxable resources have made relatively the best record of all. Even with the effort the States are making, however, the situation remains critical.

What can we do about it? In my opinion, the first thing is for the Congress to enact legislation authorizing Federal grants to the States for operating expenses of elementary and secondary education. That is the highest priority need today. The peak wave of children of school age which is starting to hit the elementary schools now will be felt in the secondary schools in the next 6 years. The urgent need now, above all else, is to secure more teachers and to meet the other increased operating costs.

As to Federal funds for school construction, the situation is not so clear. The total size of the construction job, the rate of construction needed, the degree of Federal assistance which should be provided, if any, all need careful study.

Over the past 10 years or more, substantial consensus has been achieved on a method of providing Federal financial support for operating costs. There is general agreement that this can be done without interfering with State responsibility for the scope and content of education. There is general agreement on a method of distribution to take account of both the varying financial capacity of different States and the number of children of school age.

However, as yet, there is no such general agreement in the case of Federal financial assistance for construction. I would not say that we should never look forward to Federal aid for building schools. I do think, however, that careful study is necessary to determine the need for the location and kind of building required to provide educational opportunity for children, youth, and adults. Such planning, evident in some areas now, should precede and accompany long-range programs of school construction.

HIGHER EDUCATION

Let us look beyond elementary and secondary education to the colleges and universities.

It becomes increasingly clear that as our national economy grows more complex, and as the United States assumes a greater position of leadership and responsibility in international affairs, higher education must be made available to every young American who is able to profit from it.

The President recognized this problem when he appointed his Commission on Higher Education. He stated the Commission's first concern to be "ways and means of expanding educational opportunities for all able young people."

The President's Commission found that, in terms of the number of young people with the ability to complete college and postgraduate work, the total enrollment in our institutions of higher learning should be more than double what it is today. It was found that the economic barrier is the greatest single factor that has so far restricted the number who receive higher education.

What part should the Federal Government play in meeting this problem?

Federal assistance to higher education is not new and is based on sound precedent. For many years the Federal Government has encouraged and assisted the colleges and universites, through grants of land and money and by exempting nonprofit institutions from Federal taxation. Recently, during the 1930's, more help has been given through construction grants for tax-supported institutions, and a program of student aid under the National Youth Administration.

At the present time, over a million veterans of World War II are attending higher educational institutions all over the country, and under the GI bill they receive their tuition and subsistence from the Federal Government. This greatly increased enrollment, while it has taxed the facilities of our colleges, has at the same time given us an indication of how many young people really want to continue their education, if they have the opportunity to do so.

In the next few years, I believe we must plan, in the light of the report of the President's Commission on Higher Education, the best means by which the Federal Government can give scholarship aid to worthy young people who desire to continue their education.

We Americans believe in a free market of ideas. We are convinced that in the struggle between democracy and totalitarianism, only people who have been trained to make sound individual judgments, can effectively resist a dogma or party line imposed from above. If America is to retain its freedom in a world of conflicting ideologies, we must take steps to assure every American youth the opportunity to receive the highest level of education by which he can profit. A soundly conceived Federal scholarship program is a necessary step in achieving this goal.

SCIENTIFIC RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

At the same time, we should consider another matter, closely related to higher education. That is the problem of scientific education and research.

All of us are aware how much our modern civilization depends on the advance of scientific knowledge. From the broad problems of national defense down to the questions of better methods of building houses or organizing municipal police departments, modern science is the pivot for action and progress.

We know that as the frontiers of our knowledge have been pushed forward, the wealth of America has increased by leaps and bounds and the American way of life has improved. There are no known limits to the discovery of knowledge. We have discovered considerable new knowledge in our time—some of it under the stress of emergency.

Some of the knowledge we gained in wartime has awed and appalled us, but one good thing we gained. That is the deepening realization that we stand only at the gateway to a world of new knowledge. The use we make of our new knowledge is mankind's to decide. Our responsibility is to proceed intelligently in our search for this knowledge.

The President's Scientific Research Board, of which I had the honor to be chairman, reported that as a nation we need more trained scientists, and in the next few years we should seek to double the amount of money we are spending on scientific research.

This Board pointed out that in the past our scientific strength lay in development rather than in discovery. They warned us that we were woefully lagging in the field of basic scientific research, the area most vital to progress and for which we were almost completely dependent upon Europe. We can no longer afford the luxury of importing basic scientific knowledge. We must develop our own.

What should we do about this problem? I believe that the State government and the Federal Government have similar roles to play. The State universities and colleges need support from State governments for greatly expanded programs for training all kinds of scientists and for scientific research. The Federal Government should devote more funds to scientific training and research in its own laboratories and research agencies, through grants to colleges and universities, and through scholarships and fellowships.

Although such programs require money, the amount is very small compared to total Government expenditures—either State or Federal. Consider your own State universities—a doubling of their budgets for scientific training and research would be a very small percentage of the total State education budget. In the case of the Federal Government, outlays such as I have recommended are almost negligible beside the total cost of the Army or Navy or Air Force.

And yet these relatively small outlays can be tremendously fruitful. If through support of basic research we can find a preventive or cure for cancer—or if by scholarships we give training to men who can lead the way to a successful United Nations—think of the enormous dividends we would receive on our investment.

These are the reasons why I believe so strongly that the Federal legislation for a National Science Foundation should be enacted soon. This foundation would provide the coordinating agency we need to gear together the various Federal research and scientific training programs. And the foundation would provide the national focus so badly needed to give guidance to all scientific research and training—public and private—guidance not in the sense of direction and control but in the sense of suggestions for program balance and emphasis.

It is clear, for example, that a portion of the funds expended by the National Science Foundation should be used to strengthen the weaker, but promising, colleges and universities, and thus to increase our total scientific potential. It is clear, also, that the Science Foundation would aid students in every part of the country to contribute to the advance of scientific knowledge.

I want to conclude my remarks to you tonight by referring to the last report of the Executive Director of the Council of State Governments. He said that more and more our local and State governments must concentrate on improving and preserving the American type of democracy wherein lies our strength and our welfare. With that statement I thoroughly agree.

That is why I have wanted to talk to you tonight about better education and increased knowledge. The ultimate strength of our democracy lies in the minds of its citizens. And it is through an enlightened citizenry devoted to right principles that our democracy will be improved and preserved.

I believe that your work along the lines I have discussed tonight will carry us forward toward that goal. In all these enterprises the Federal Government is not an overseer but a partner. Upon the success, my friends, of this partnership in the safeguarding of our liberties and in the strengthening of our democracy, depends the safety not only of our own great America, but of the world.

Uncle Sam Should Graduate From a Medical School Before He Is Permitted To Operate

OF

HON. CHARLES J. KERSTEN

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 31, 1948

Mr. KERSTEN of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, social engineers who have risen so high in the councils of our Government act by paradox. The less they know about a difficult subject the bolder is their blueprint for it.

It is an old trick for a dilettante to dazzle the rest of us mere laymen with scientific jargon that we admit we do not know much about but which he uses with abandon. An Eleanor Roosevelt can toss off an international bill of rights between her labors for ladies' magazine columns. As Oscar Ewing can present to the Congress of the United States the administration's national health program that would make the medical profession a political pawn.

The potential tragedy in these two instances consists in this: Both Eleanor Roosevelt and Oscar Ewing have the authority of the President behind them; both are unqualified in the field they seek to control; both are urging a thesis that has popular appeal, but which if carried out would place us well on the way toward state socialism.

We are all in favor of as much social security for our citizens as is consistent with the preservation of private initiative and self-reliance that is so necessary for the American way of life. But the strength and grandeur of America will sink in a slough of socialist mediocrity. If everyone looks to everybody else and all look to the state to get things done, then, indeed, is the characteristic quality of the United States lost. Mrs. Roosevelt would extend political security into every phase of life and all over the world. The state then becomes the great intelligence for everyone. It becomes the great planner for every detail of our lives. All of our difficult problems we are urged to turn over to the state for solution.

What is this state that will solve everything? In great part it is composed of political appointees who are far removed from the people and with no direct responsibility to them.

The Eighty-first Congress will be importuned to enact Oscar Ewing's national health scheme. The Government wants to control the medical profession of the country. Uncle Sam wants to operate. Uncle Sam had better go through the grueling experience of a medical education before he operates. The thousands of Federal bureaucrats who would have a hand in American medical policy should first go to a medical school before they are sworn in.

When you or your child are really sick, you do not want a social reformer, you want a doctor. Ewing's national health proposal is a social reformer's proposal, not a doctor's.

Every doctor that I have talked to is against it. No doctor wants his practice cluttered up with Government red tape. A doctor has been trained to work on human forms, not Government forms.

Who is best qualified to appraise plans for the Nation's health, political medicine men or men who have devoted their lives to the great art and science of medicine?

Ewing says that all he wants to do is to give everybody the purchasing power for adequate medical care. This in and of itself sounds innocent enough. It is how he proposes to do it that should cause us great alarm; by a Nation-wide scheme of taxation that means every doctor goes on the Government pay roll and is subject to Government policy.

Politicians that seriously fight for this measure are power mad. If adopted it is a crossing of the Rubicon to bureaucratic state socialism. If the medical profession is politized there is no valid reason for not socializing every other profession. There are stronger reasons for socializing most industries than for socializing the professions. The professions are the most individualistic of human activities. There is greater cause to socialize the food-producing industries, steel, coal, railroads, and all the rest. If the Socialists masquerading as Democrats succeed in capturing the medical profession they will have won the decisive battle in the war for the socialist state.

John J. Jewkes, professor of political economy at the University of Manchester, England, writing of the English experiment with socialism says in his recent book entitled "Ordeal by Planning":

> There is a watershed in these matters where, vague as the flows may momentarily seem, the difference between east and west, north and south, liberty and slavery is being irrevocably determined. I submit that there is no doubt in which direction the current has started to flow for us. If we ask about the Britain of the present day the following questions: Are people entitled freely to choose and change their occupation? are consumers free to distribute their incomes between different goods in the proportions they would wish? are producers free to seek out and satisfy the freely expressed preferences of consumers? are contracts of service a matter for individuals? is the economy being allowed to knit naturally with the world economy?—the answer in each case is categorically "No."

As Jewkes points out, the modern planning movement sets out, with good will and noble intentions, to control things and invariably ends up by controlling men.

The administration's social reformers want to socialize the medical profession because they say the AMA is stuffy and reactionary. I suppose there is a lot of stuffiness in every strata of society. But for constipation of intellect, exasperating duplication and waste, buck-passing from one administrator to another, I have seen the choicest examples in Federal bureaucracy. It is a shame that the average American citizen is so far removed from the Washington scene as not to be aware of it first hand.

If Ewing and his power hungry associates claim that only American doctors belonging to the AMA are against his plan let us consider the action taken by the World Medical Association in September of this year. That association is composed of the representative medical bodies of Australia, Bulgaria, Canada, China, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Egypt, Eire, Finland, France, Great Britain, Iceland, Luxemburg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Palestine—Arab-Jewish, South Africa, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, United States of America. The 1948 report states, in part, as follows:

Whenever medical care is provided as part of social security the following principles should govern its provision:

First. Freedom of choice of physician by the patient. Liberty of physician to choose patient except in case of urgency or humanitarianism.

Second. No intervention of third party between physician and patient.

Third. Where medical service is to be submitted to control, this control should be exercised by physicians.

Fourth. Freedom of choice of hospital by patient.

Fifth. Freedom of the physician to choose the location and type of his practice.

Sixth. No restriction of medication or mode of treatment by physician except in case of abuse.

Seventh. Appropriate representation of medical profession in every official body dealing with medical care.

Eighth. It is not in the public interest that physicians should be full-time salaried servants of the Government or social security bodies.

Ninth. Remuneration of medical services ought not to depend directly on the financial condition of the insurance organization.

Tenth. Any social security or insurance plan must be open to participation of any licensed physician, and no physician should be compelled to participate if he does not wish to do so.

Eleventh. Compulsory health insurance plans should cover only those persons who are unable to make their own arrangements for medical care.

Twelfth. There shall be no exploitation of the physician, the physician's services or the public, by any person or organization.

Before the administration asks us to adopt the national health scheme let them first demonstrate that Army medicine is better than private medicine. Let the Government clean house in the health fields in which it has already embarked.

Standards of American medical practice are the highest in the world. Let the social reformers beware in tampering with them. They are not here dealing with coal mines, railroads, or steel. They are dealing with the lives and deaths that balance in the doctor's hands. The hand of the political reformer does not belong in the operating room.

Emergency Italian Immigration Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT TRIPP ROSS
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 31, 1948

Mr. ROSS. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced a bill today to authorize the United States to assist during an emergency period in rehabilitating and stabilizing Italy's economy by permitting the admission of an increased number of Italian nationals into the United States for permanent residence who are relatives of United States citizens, or agricultural, skilled, professional, and other workers needed in the United States.

The bill provides that during the 4 fiscal years following its passage, 300,000 Italian nationals be admitted into the United States for permanent residence at a rate of approximately 75,000 for each year without regard to quota limitations for those years.

Fully realizing that this Congress cannot act upon this particular bill, I nevertheless introduce the measure at this time to emphasize the urgency of having the United States take some action to aid Italy in resolving its most pressing problem. It is hoped that the next Congress will give consideration early in the next session to the enactment of legislation to permit the admission of an additional 300,000 Italian nationals during the next 4 years.

The United States has sought to aid the rehabilitation and stabilization of the Italian economy through the United Nations and the European recovery program. We have joined the other freedom-loving nations of the world in supporting Italy's efforts to resist the imposition of communism.

It is the opinion of those who are in a position to know that during the next few years Italy will be the crux of the cold war effort in Europe. If the nations of western Europe are to remain free, Italy must be provided every assistance in preventing Communist domination. Overpopulation of Italy is the greatest threat to success in the cold war. The economy of the United States needs and could easily absorb an additional 300,000 Italians, and should take the lead in relieving Italy of part of her overpopulation.

OVERPOPULATION AND THE INTERNAL PROBLEMS OF ITALY

Overpopulation in Italy complicates every phase of her economic life. In a territory little more than half the size of France, whose economy is close enough to Italy's for comparison, Italy has to support a population greater than that of France by more than 4,000,000. Moreover, much of the land is barren mountains, and even the best land is not particularly fertile. The Italian birth rate is one of the highest in western Europe, markedly above that of Great Britain, France, and Germany. Every year the population increases by more than 400,000.

While many nations of the world are short of labor, Italy, whose population is 45,000,000, has 2,300,000 unemployed. The factories are compelled by government order to employ much unnecessary labor. Many of the people on the pay rolls of the factories who work only part time or not at all for long periods, are being paid just the same. This increases costs of production and reduces the amount of goods sold abroad.

Italy is deficient in most raw materials that make a strong economy, such as coal, iron ore, and petroleum. She has small reserves of coal and iron ore but practically no petroleum. The poor soil is intensely worked and cannot supply food enough for the people.

In the past, Italy's answer to the problem of overpopulation has been immigrations overseas. Today that is no longer possible to any great extent, chiefly because of the restrictive legislation of overseas countries. Since World War I, millions of Italians who would have made a new life elsewhere have had to be supported within Italy itself, making the population problem still more acute than it had been before. The result has been a lowering of the standard of living in agricultural areas which formerly provided the most immigrants, fewer opportunities for work, and lower real wages.

THE UNITED STATES NEEDS AND CAN ASSIMILATE 300,000 ITALIAN NATIONALS

From 1887 to 1916, almost 4,000,000 Italians came to the United States, more than half of them between 1906 and 1916. They are peculiarly susceptible to the influence of the Americanization process and are most enthusiastic supporters of the American way of life. They readily become thoroughly American in thought, word, and deed. Italian immigrants in the United States have made a name for themselves and have taken an active and patriotic part in the civil and military activities of the country. The inherent sociability of the Italian is proverbial, but whereas in Europe it is confined to the small village group, in this country it assumes the form of intense and enduring interest in the problems and welfare of all the citizens of our country. The grace, ambition, and courtesy of Italian children and their heritage of thrift and industry are noticeable. These ambitious and forward-looking people have indeed made a place for themselves in the modern life of America. Many have gone into small-scale enterprises and have eventually built up large businesses by the exercise of these virtues. The natural health with which the Italian physique is endowed is a valuable addition to the biological heritage of the American people. The robust physical endowment of the Italian has built many a railroad, street, and building in the United States. These people know how to use their brawn when labor is needed and how to take jobs which require skill and trained abilities for which physical strength is not a prime requisite.

They have become lawyers, doctors, construction workers, engineers, and businessmen in great numbers, entering every form of business, industrial, and professional life. There are judges, legislators, and teachers of Italian origin throughout the country. During the last half century, literally thousands of Italian-Americans have held public office in the United States, including three governors, two chief justices of State supreme courts, Congressmen, mayors, and so forth. Others have been teachers, musicians, and artists. Many served in both World Wars, making distinguished records for themselves. Twenty Medals of Honor were awarded to men of Italian-American descent in World War II.

The Italian immigrant has shown that with the changing tides of economic need, he can with facility turn his hand to common labor, to skilled artisan work and to managerial or business functions. The Italian faculty for art and music is proverbial, for it has achieved an appreciation for the colorful aspects of life in a most highly developed fashion.

A study of the economic factors involved indicates the necessity and the desirability of increasing the number of Italian immigrants, and the ability of the United States to assimilate them. During the summer of 1948, the labor force in the United States reached an all-time high of slightly over 63,000,000 workers including the self-employed students and seasonal workers. Expanding job opportunities resulted in drawing a large number of women back into the labor force following the decline which occurred after VJ-day. Unemployment has been small, averaging only about 2,000,000. This number is assumed to represent the minimum possible with an unrestricted labor force free to move from one job to another.

There are many professions and labor categories where it is indicated a definite shortage will exist for many years. Among these are the building trades. Our expanding defense requirements will further accentuate the shortage of foundry workers in the iron and steel industries, and workers in the coal industry. Thousands of permanent agricultural workers are needed. Approximately 35,000 foreign workers were under contract for agricultural work last season.

If we are to maintain our position as the leading world power, we will be required to utilize a greater proportion of our manpower in other territories. We shall also be required to expand our production facilities which we cannot do without additional manpower.

PRESENT IMMIGRATION POLICY UNFAIR TO ITALIANS

Notwithstanding the great contribution made to the American economy, United States immigration laws enacted after World War I unfairly restricted Italian immigration to this country. Under the Immigration Act of 1924, Italy's quota is only 5,802 per year.

The enactment of immigration laws in 1921, 1924, and 1929 established permanent quotas based on national origins. Under the national origins plan, effective July 1, 1949, the number of immigrants to be admitted each year was reduced to 153,714. Over 80 percent of the quota allocations was reserved for natives of countries of northern and western Europe. Subsequently, however, immigration has not flowed in the national origins channels mapped out and national quotas have never been fully utilized. During the period from 1930 to 1946, only 23 percent of the quota numbers was utilized. The favored countries of northern and western Europe used only 17 percent of their quotas. Southern and eastern Europe utilized 43 percent of theirs.

INCREASED ITALIAN IMMIGRATION VITAL TO OUR FOREIGN PROGRAM

The urgency of the need for Italian emigration and its close relationship to the Economic Cooperation Act may be gathered from the following conclusion of the Organization for European Economic Cooperation Countries in their report of October 25, 1948. Under the heading "Italy," it states:

> The number of unemployed is due to the loss by Italy since 1926 of the traditional outlets by emigration for her surplus population which between 1891 and 1926 amounted to an average of 300,000 a year. It is estimated that the E. R. P. will increase the number of persons in employment by 120,000 and that about another 100,000 persons will be able to emigrate during the year 1948–1949.

It is not contended that the enactment of emergency Italian immigration legislation to permit an additional 300,000 Italians to enter the United States during the next 4 years is a panacea or a solution for all of Italy's problems. However, it would represent a substantial step forward in aiding Italy in the following ways:

First. It would help the Italian economy.

Second. It would reduce the Italian relief load and produce greater social stability in that country.

Third. It would speed Italian recovery under the E. C. A., and in many ways do away with the discontent and unrest which communism must have if it is to grow. Aid to Italy, to be fully effective, must include a measure of relief from its overpopulation. The proposal to admit an additional 300,000 Italian nationals to the United States during the next 4 years is of such prime importance to our effort to aid in the revitalization of the Italian economy that it should be included as an integral part of our foreign program.

A bill to authorize the United States, during an emergency period, to assist in rehabilitating and stabilizing Italy's economy by permitting the admission into the United States, for permanent residence, of an increased number of Italian nationals who are relatives of United States citizens, and agricultural, skilled, professional, and other workers needed in the United States, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That this act may be cited as the "Emergency Italian Immigration Act."

SEC. 2. During the 4 fiscal years following the passage of this act a number of immigration visas not to exceed 300,000 may be issued at a rate of approximately 75,000 for each year without regard to quota limitations for those years to Italian nationals for permanent residence in the United States: Provided, That (1) They are qualified for admission for permanent residence under all United States immigration laws not inconsistent with the provisions of this act; (2) No visas shall be issued under the provisions of this act to any person who of his own accord is or has been a member of, or participated in, any movement which is or has been hostile to the United States or the form of government of the United States.

SEC. 3. The following priorities, without priority as between classes specified in priority (a), shall be granted to persons and their family dependents in consideration of visa applications:

(a) First. Farm laborers; physicians; dentists; medical nurses; household, construction, clothing, and garment workers; or possessing educational, scientific, or technological qualifications.

(b) Second. Blood relatives of citizens or lawfully admitted alien residents of the United States, such relationship in either case being within the third degree of consanguinity computed according to the rules of the common law.

SEC. 4. Any person, other than a relative as defined in subsection (b) of section 3, or any recognized voluntary agency in the United States desiring to assist a person to enter the United States under this act shall be required to file a suitable and proper bond, approved by the Attorney General, undertaking and assuming to save the United States or any State or Territory or subdivision of either from expense in the event such immigrant should become a public charge, such obligation to be enforceable in the courts of the United States, by suit brought in the name of and by the proper law officers of the United States or of any State or Territory or subdivision of either upon which the burden falls in the event such immigrant becomes a public charge: Provided, That the admission of such alien shall be a consideration for the giving of such bond: And provided further, That the applicants for admission shall be approved for settlement in the particular State or Territory to which they are destined only in accordance with the settlement opportunities and numbers certified to the Commission by the chief executive officer thereof.

SEC. 5. No person shall be issued an immigration visa under this act if he is known or believed by the consular officer to be subject to exclusion from the United States under any provision of the immigration laws, with the exception of the contract labor clause of section 3 of the Immigration Act of February 5, 1917, as amended (39 Stat. 875–878; 8 U. S. C. 136), and that part of the said act which excludes from the United States persons whose ticket or passage is paid by another or by any corporation, association, society, municipality, or foreign government, either directly or indirectly.

SEC. 6. (a) That the title of the "Displaced Persons Commission" created by Public Law 774, Eightieth Congress, is hereby amended and 30 days after this act becomes a public law, shall be known as the Displaced Persons and Emergency Immigration Commission.

It shall be the duty of the Commission to carry out its duties as specified in Public Law 774 and (1) to perform or oversee the performance of the administrative functions necessary for effectuating the provisions of this act, including thorough screening of all applicants; (2) to make rules and regulations, requisite for the effectuation of the provisions of this act; (3) to report to Congress semiannually on the operations carried out under the act, including the rate of immigration thereunder, the manner of selection of, and distribution of opportunities to immigrate among the persons covered in this act, and the resettlement of such persons having regard both to questions of economic opportunity and housing and to geographic distribution; (4) to coordinate and assist in the task of resettlement of such persons in the United States, its Territories, or possessions; (5) to consult and cooperate with the various State agencies established to deal with resettlement of emergency immigrants and with such voluntary agencies actively participating therein as shall register with and be approved by the Commission for that purpose.

(b) Within the limits of such funds as may be appropriated to the Commission or as may be allocated to it by the President, the Commission may employ necessary personnel without regard to the civil-service laws or the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, and make provisions for necessary supplies, facilities, and services to carry out the provisions and accomplish the purpose of this act. The Commission, however, shall use such statistical information, fiscal personnel, and other general business services and facilities as may be made available to them through other established Government departments and agencies. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated from time to time, out of moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such amounts as may be necessary to carry out the provisions and accomplish the purposes of this act.

SEC. 7. Except as otherwise expressly provided in this act, the administration of this act, under the provisions of this act and the regulations of the Commission as herein provided, shall be by the officials who administer the other immigration laws of the United States. Except as otherwise authorized in this act, all immigration laws, including deportation laws, shall be applicable to eligible persons who apply to be or who are admitted into the United States pursuant to this act.

SEC. 8. Any person who knowingly violates or conspires to violate any provision of this act shall be guilty of a felony, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $10,000 and shall be imprisoned not less than 2 nor more than 10 years.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, this Congress terminates today with the ending of 1948. The coming of the New Year will usher in another Congress, dedicated as this one to the people of the United States.

As a Member of the new Congress, I consider it my duty to follow the dictates and the wishes of the people who elected me.

I am going to strive to ascertain the needs of the folks back home and approach every question which comes to the House with a view to helping them.

The veterans can count on my continuing the fight to preserve the rights and gains they have made in legislation.

The farmers can rest assured I will study all angles of each measure I am called upon to consider in the light of their welfare.

The workers in the great industries of Endicott Johnson, of IBM, of ANSCO, of Norwich Pharmacal, of the Norwich Knitting Co., of Oneida Community, and of all the other factories back home may look forward to my positive action in their behalf.

The young men now in our military training centers and in our armed forces abroad can look for my friendly interest into their wants and their outlook on future preparedness.

The parents and families of our GI's and our veterans can be certain that letters and messages they write and appeals they make to me will be acted upon immediately.

The patriotic Americans of my district will find me as alert, as vigilant, as energetic to see our peace preserved and our country protected as I have tried to be in the past.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE H. BENDER
OF OHIO

A THOUGHT FOR 1949—IDEALISM IS PRACTICAL

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, as the New Year arrives, burdened with the unsolved problems of the old, and as the Eightieth Congress turns over its heavy backlog of unfinished business to the Eighty-first, the proverbial year-end inventory is clearly in order. This year, more than ever before, that inventory is likely to give us sharp pause.

On the international scene, we have developed a schism between East and West which appears to be growing deeper by the day. The United Nations Assembly has become a forum for the mouthing of suspicions, charges, countercharges, and violent denunciations. Perhaps this is a world-wide safety valve, but there can be no denying that relations between the Soviet Union and its satellites on the one hand and the Western Powers and their allies on the other have deteriorated to an incredible extent since the end of the war.

This is no longer a matter of interest to a relatively limited number of people in one or two countries. The extension of atomic science, having mastered the primary problem of nuclear fission, is clearly moving at a staggering rate of speed for so costly and difficult a task. Our atomic scientists say that "a new type of thinking is essential if mankind is to survive and move to higher levels."

There is no evidence whatever of such new thinking in diplomatic circles. We are still playing the same old games with the same old techniques. Mr. Truman will sit in Washington; Mr. Bevin will sit in London; and Mr. Stalin will sit in Moscow until some catastrophe draws them together in a conference dealing with world order. Meanwhile, the thinking of the man in the street, whose momentary fear is of atomic warfare, is moving far ahead of our statesmanship. Today as at few times in history, the position of the idealists is the most practical approach to world affairs. Without that idealism, all of us, poor or rich, weak or powerful, stand in danger. We are the possessors of the atomic bomb.

It is our job to take the lead in creating sound world peace—with Russia's help if possible, without it if necessary. Neither Russia nor any other country could stand outside of an organized world based on the same principles which governed our own national union. This is the primary responsibility of thinking men and women in 1949.

WHAT'S AHEAD FOR EUROPE?

Reporters talking squarely about European affairs have put their finger on the ticklish spots. They are warning us that explosive possibilities exist in virtually every nation on the continent. Workers in the cities are finding it more and more difficult to buy the products they are manufacturing in their factories. Housewives find it very hard to reconcile hard work with continuously rising prices. Inflation is on the rise everywhere, and food, clothing, and shelter are as dull, skimpy, and inadequate as they were during the war.

The failure of the Marshall plan to reflect itself in lower prices for food is prompting the question, "What good is American help to us?" At the same time, the gulf between rich and poor in Europe, pronounced even before the war years, is becoming wider. Lavish display by aristocrats, in close proximity to poverty for the masses, has given the Communists the opportunity to exploit class antagonisms all too effectively. Black markets flourish; illegal exports go on; production of luxuries in defiance of critical needs is tolerated by governments which pay lip service to the ideal of equality.

These factors are not intangible on today's market. They are the material out of which revolutions grow. Historically, Europe has never gone through a major war era without the breeding of a revolutionary epoch. Unless the men who run the show can stop the efforts of those who are seeking to make or increase their fortunes by the exploitation of their fellow men in Europe, we may see a repetition of this phenomenon which will dwarf all those that have gone before.

AVIATION OUTLOOK FOR 1949

Despite the publicity which invariably attends every airplane crash, the record of commercial aviation in the year just ended makes good reading. Fewer than one-half the fatalities recorded in 1947 took place in the past 12 months. In domestic accidents, 83 passengers and 14 crew members died in air traffic. Express and freight shipments went up 47 percent, but the number of newly licensed pilots and the training program for new fliers have suffered reverses during the past year.

These indications of improved safety and the simultaneous need for a training program to effect continued improvements in our national flying skills are of great importance to the entire industry. Sales of private aircraft have declined, due in large part to a lack of interest in educational advertising, and in efforts to educate young people to the opportunities of aviation careers.

The emphasis upon military aviation to the exclusion of private flying has been all too apparent in recent years. Perhaps the industry is waiting for its future, but to those who recall the amazing success of the automobile in revolutionizing our mode of life the age of flight presents the same challenge and the same opportunity. What flying needs is a Henry Ford.

Statement of George J. Burger, National Federation of Small Business

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH P. O'HARA
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 31, 1948

Mr. O'HARA. Mr. Speaker, I am sure the statement of Mr. George J. Burger, of the National Federation of Small Business, before the Subcommittee to Investigate Monopolistic Practices, on November 17, 1948, will be of great interest to the membership of the House in considering the problems of that great segment of our economy known as small business, and under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I wish to submit the following:

My name is George J. Burger. I am a member of the board of directors of the National Federation of Small Business, Inc., head office San Mateo, Calif., a national organization, which has the largest individual membership of any business organization in the Nation. I am also in charge of the Washington office of the National Federation of Small Business, Inc., located in the Bond Building, Washington, D. C.

I am glad to have the privilege to appear before the committee and express our views on the monopoly situation as we find them due to the reports, either from our Nation-wide membership, or through the contacts our sales force has in their daily visits with small-business institutions throughout the Nation.

The monopoly situation facing small business is no new problem insofar as the federation is concerned, and it will be found from the record that the federation has been in the forefront of all small-business organizations of this Nation in making it its principal and main objective to bring relief to the people we represent—small business. It is our opinion that if monopoly is not destroyed it will eventually destroy our Nation and build for complete regimentation by the Government of all businesses throughout the Nation.

We took this position after directives from our members, and due to the startling testimony given by the then Assistant Attorney General, the Honorable Wendell Berge, before the Senate Civil Service Committee in February 1947, where he stated in substance that for 35 years the administrations had been merely giving lip service to the enforcement of antitrust laws, and it is our opinion that many big businesses and monopolies were aware of this situation and shaped their policies accordingly.

In his testimony he brings out the fact that of the 175 lawyers in the Department, there were 25 or 30 career men as he termed them, who have been with the Department for 10 years or more. In view of this it is nothing short of miraculous that the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice was able, up to the present time, to do the job that it has done. Apparently the same condition must apply to the Federal Trade Commission in enforcing the laws entrusted to the Commission.

We refer to the federation's testimony before the Joint Committee on the Economic Report, July 14, 1947, where we specifically asked that committee to make a definite recommendation for vigorous enforcement of the antitrust laws, and further urged that committee to recommend a special appropriation for both agencies so that the laws could be enforced. It was our thought that through such a recommendation being put into effect, it would bring about a reduction in prices, speed production, and, more important insofar as we are concerned, protect the people whom we represent—independent business of this Nation.

The Small Business Committees of the Congress have been in operation since the fall of 1940. The reports of these committees and their recommendations are of a startling nature, and to the credit of these committees, no one from the monopoly side of our economic picture has seen fit to challenge the reports and findings of the committees. We say without fear of contradiction that if these small-business committees of the Congress had not been in operation these past 8 years, it would be a safe conclusion that most small business of this Nation would have been reduced to a minimum, and further, monopolies would have been increased to a greater extent than now prevailing. In other words, the actions of these committees have been a deterrent not only to increased monopolies, but a spark to the antitrust agencies of the Government to go out and do an effective job.

It is our hope and trust and recommendation that the new Congress will have the wisdom and foresight to reconstitute these committees, both in the Senate and in the House, because without the functioning of these committees the future of small business will be in a precarious condition.

I have just completed visits in Los Angeles, San Francisco, Portland, Great Falls, Denver, St. Louis, and Cincinnati. During these visits I not only was privileged to confer with the field officers of the federation, but also the executive officers, and I was also privileged to visit with many groups of small-business men in the respective cities. In certain cities I was interviewed by the press, and to the credit of the press, they gave considerable publicity in their respective papers to these conferences. We in the federation were encouraged to see this publicity and we asked a representative of a leading paper "how come" and he remarked that members of the working press now believe that small-business problems are news for the American public to get. In other cities, I was invited on two occasions to speak over the air. One was a panel discussion on the problems of small business and the position of the federation on many of these problems, and particularly the monopoly that exists in the business structure which even reaches to the labor field. In both queries and in the answers, the federation's position was just this—wherever monopoly exists in any part of our economy it must be eliminated and destroyed, whether at the high or low level of industry.

In my visits in the respective cities it would appear that antitrust violations are becoming more rampant than ever before in the history of our Nation. It has reached an exceptionally low level. In most States there are laws for protection where violations are taking place, but it is my opinion that many States are deficient in carrying out the laws and the public is being gouged through such practices. More important, small business is being misled and the free enterprise system is falling by the wayside.

In my own industry, rubber tires, with which I have been connected for close to 40 years, I do know that many of the suggested and recommended ideas for violations of either State or National laws originate in the minds and thinking of the big monopolists of that industry. I say this without fear of contradiction, and apparently if such conditions exist in that industry, possibly the same pattern is being followed in other industries controlled by monopolies. Again, small independents are being misled and free enterprise is being destroyed, and regimentation is coming from the dictates of those who desire to protect the monopoly in their respective field, and not from the Government as monopoly would have us believe.

We do not come to this conclusion without close study of the situation through keeping our eyes and ears open. Monopoly and regimentation do not appear only in the business structure, but might also apply in labor. Encouragement should be given to the youth of this Nation to go into the various trades so that the services of sufficient and adequate numbers in their own businesses will be available to the American public.

We in the federation were encouraged a few days ago when the President of the United States asked all Government agencies to let him know by November 29, what new laws they believe are needed in their fields. We are pleased with the action of the President in view of the fact that the plank on which he was reelected carried these recommendations:

1. Intensive enforcement of antitrust laws with adequate appropriations.

2. Strengthening of existing antitrust laws where gaps exist.

3. A positive program to promote competitive business, independent trade.

Due to the President's request we immediately communicated with the Attorney General of the United States and the Chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, making specific recommendations as to what we believe would strengthen antitrust enforcement and protect the free enterprise system, and further, protect the life of small business of this Nation. It is our hope and trust that these department heads will take under consideration the recommendations of the federation in their memorandum to the President pertaining to antitrust activities. What a deplorable and wretched situation when one reviews the testimony recently given at public hearings of the House Small Business Committee in Butte, Mont., by a spokesman of the auto dealers in that State, where it appears from his testimony that independents in that industry do as they are told or peril their own business success within that industry. Of course, that information was no news to me as I was aware of this situation as early as 1930, and in some degree, through such regimentation by the "big" in the auto industry, it cost me my own individual business and cost many other independents their businesses.

The public does not benefit by such regimentation either in savings or qualities but whether they know it or not, they were a party to a plan that increased monopoly's hold, swelled the profits of monopolies, and goes a long ways to destroy real free enterprise.

Also, in the recent hearings of the House Small Business Committee in Madison, Wis., a similar situation was reported by the spokesman for independent filling stations in that area and the committee must bear in mind that what was reported in Madison, Wis., area is being duplicated throughout the Nation, so there is no free enterprise, or, in plain words, you will do as you are told or else. It will be found in the Senate Small Business Committee report released in the summer of 1941, that that committee reported similar findings. Is it any wonder, in the earlier part of my statement, that we said antitrust violations, etc., had reached such a low level? Surely the testimony both at Butte and Madison does confirm in some degree my findings in other sections of the country.

Only recently in discussing the over-all situation, I was amazed to hear that some trade associations whom I cannot identify take the position of the impossibility of having anything done with antitrust laws, or to fight big business and are willing to concede to any such regimentation that monopoly might want to bring into existence. May I add at this point that this was the worry that was in the mind of an important individual who recently attended some gatherings where he said that he could only come to that conclusion. I do not want to take the time of the committee to go into all details of an industry with which I am well acquainted. By that I mean the vicious practices, most of them unlawful. Most of the members know that I have not been deficient in laying the facts on the line before the Small Business Committee for several years or more, and also the Department of Justice and the Federal Trade Commission knows that I have not been deficient in reporting the actual conditions existing. I would like to read into the record a letter from a high executive of one of the big rubber companies, written to me on February 20, 1945:

"DEAR GEORGE: I thought your last issue of the National Independent No. 9 was good because I liked the way you are putting the spotlight on rubber-oil-tire business. To my way of thinking the oil company picture in the future is going to be a definite part of all tire distribution, and I would not be a bit surprised but that they will be more important in liquidating the independent than the so-called company-owned stores chains.

"I do not know that there is anything wrong with oil companies distributing tires but I do believe that the constant growth of this type of operation should be placed before dealers at all times."

The present House Small Business Committee had some evidence some 3 years later of what this high representative of a rubber company expressed as to his concern. And when that independent in Alabama was being assisted by the committee after the independent had complained of the situation it was plain as the nose on your face that he must have been visited by a major oil company to retract his statement or he would have to find himself a new place of business.

We in the federation see the ever-increasing pressure being placed on independents in other lines of industry where they are being compelled to take merchandise they don't want or they cannot get what they want, and it all revolves itself to the basic proposition—the control in the hands of a few in most industries throughout the Nation. I think that this can be confirmed through the staff report to the monopoly subcommittee of the House Small Business Committee of the Seventy-ninth Congress, United States versus Economic Concentration and Monopoly. Surely this amazing document discloses a situation of the most alarming nature which exists in our economy. Also note the findings of the chairman of the Senate Small Business Committee, Future of Independent Business, Senate Committee Print No. 16, second session, Seventy-ninth Congress. Although it might appear that we are stressing important implications as to monopolistic practices in one major industry, it is our belief that regimentation existing in that industry may have originated with them or been copied from other industries. Nevertheless over 300,000 independent businesses are involved and for practical purposes the control of production is in the hands of a few giant corporations.

It must also be understood that we take no position that merely condemns big business because it is big, for such is not the case, but we do condemn big business where, by its own action, it prevents the free-enterprise system from functioning, and the public is the victim.

It is our belief that the committee is interested in what the National Federation of Small Business, Inc., recommends to bring about a cure of the situation. We reaffirm our first and principal recommendation to save the free-enterprise system, and through this small business of this Nation.

1. Enforce the antitrust laws without fear or favor on all segments of our economy. Amend the laws, if needed, but amend to strengthen and not weaken the laws. These laws have stood the test of the courts, so the arguments against them as to misunderstanding are merely smoke screens and the voice of monopoly.

To confirm this, how sickening to read the opinions of some so-called authorities as to their opinion of recent decisions of the high court in sustaining the Federal Trade Commission's actions as to Clayton and Robinson-Patman Act. These "experts," and some even in the Government, are worried about the effects on small business, and, yes, even on the "poor little candy-bar manufacturer." We in small business really relish their sympathy for small business.

A serious attempt took place in the Eightieth Congress to weaken the antitrust laws when that Congress voted the Reed-Bulwinkle bill, and when the President vetoed the bill the Congress overrode the veto. The federation members throughout the Nation, by a vote of 18 percent for, 80 percent against, and 2 percent no vote, opposed the bill, and it is the hope of the federation members that in the Eighty-first Congress that bill will be repealed and that the railroads and other interstate carriers will be under the same provisions of antitrust law as any others in our Nation's economic field. We do not believe that the Interstate Commerce Commission needs this law to assist them in regulating the interstate commerce of all descriptions that come under their regulations.

Note extract from the Christian Science Monitor of June 21, 1948, which states:

"The tide which has turned away from Government in business is running perilously fast toward private monopoly. It will bear watching. And this bill runs with, not against, that current."

2. Make it mandatory that jail sentences be levied where violations of antitrust laws take place. Fines mean nothing to the offenders. The various States should look into this situation also, to substantiate the recommendations.

I quote from the testimony of Hon. Wendell Berge, Assistant Attorney General, before the Senate Civil Service Committee, February 13, 1947:

"The CHAIRMAN (Senator LANGER). How many men did you put in the penitentiary that you prosecuted under the Sherman Act?

"Mr. BERGE. Under the Sherman Act, in the penitentiary?

"The CHAIRMAN. Yes; how many men did you put in the penitentiary as a result of prosecutions under the Sherman Act?

"Mr. BERGE. None for a generation.

"The CHAIRMAN. I want to know why, if you are prosecuting the antitrust statute, why nobody has been put in the penitentiary.

"Mr. BERGE. I have no trouble answering the question myself. I think, frankly, we have to recognize that the community does not regard the antitrust violation as a moral violation in the same essence that they would regard embezzlement.

"The CHAIRMAN. Who says that?

"Mr. BERGE. The courts and the juries. I mean there have not been convictions. Our problem, sir, in criminal cases, is to get convictions of businessmen who in the morals and traditions of the community are not regarded as criminals."

Mr. Chairman, there is so much more to the important testimony of Mr. Berge before that committee I would respectfully refer the complete text as it appears in the record, and then we can fully understand what has happened in our economic structure through the laxity of the courts in invoking the full penalties under the law. We stand by our first recommendation. However, if Congress would not go that far in amending the law as to violations then we propose in our second recommendation:

(a) Civil penalty for violations of certain sections of the antitrust laws only, such as:

1. Price fixing conspiracy.
2. Selling below cost to eliminate a competitor.
3. Discriminatory discounts, allowances, or secret rebates above a certain amount.
4. Fraudulent advertisement over a certain value—the penalty should be—

(i) The president and directors of the corporation should be removed from office and they should not be permitted to be an officer or a director of any corporation doing interstate business for 5 years. Upon second conviction they should be permanently removed from being an officer or director in any corporation doing interstate business.

By removing only the president and the board of directors, there will be left the operating vice presidents to succeed to the presidency which will mean that no corporation will be without seasoned leadership.

The Federal Communications Commission and the Securities Exchange Commission both have similar drastic rulings where a violation applies either to a broker operating under SEC or one operating a broadcasting station under the Federal Communications Act.

3. The Department should institute immediate civil action on the monopoly charge against the four major tire manufacturers.

We believe the Department has collected sufficient evidence to bring about a conviction.

The Department or the Federal Trade Commission which has the authority should institute action to bring about a separation in the oil industry from production and controlled distribution. It will be found in the TNEC findings such report was made by the FTC.

4. As to the Federal Trade Commission, they should utilize their efforts in a greater degree in enforcing the Robinson-Patman Act and particularly that section of the act that pertains to price discrimination.

The Commission is to be commended that at the moment it is making a thorough investigation of a major industry as to its discount structure and we in the federation, representing small business of this Nation, are awaiting anxiously for the result of the findings of the Commission in this important undertaking. The Commission should encourage the adoption of the amendment to the act introduced by Mr. PATMAN both in the Seventy-ninth and Eightieth Congresses, H. R. 1671—a bill relating to certain discriminatory pricing practices affecting commerce. The federation recently polled its Nation-wide membership on this bill and the vote was as follows: 77 percent for, 21 percent against, 2 percent not voting. We urge the committee to also recommend the adoption of this bill in the Eighty-first Congress.

5. During the time that the antitrust agencies have under advisement by the Congress Nos. 1 to 4, inclusive, of the federation's recommendations, it is our opinion that some immediate relief can be gained for the free enterprise system and small business of this Nation by urging immediate action on—

(a) The rubber tires bill, which would prohibit continued monopoly in the sales and servicing of tires by major oil-rubber interests. Their present control affects the future business livelihood of at least 300,000 independent retailers and through this legislation would open up the field for more independent producers.

The federation polled its membership on this bill and the result was 88 percent for, 10 percent against, and 2 percent not voting.

(b) Urge immediate action by the Ways and Means Committee in this or succeeding Congress, H. R. 1672, introduced by Mr. PATMAN, both in the Seventy-ninth and Eightieth Congresses, a bill relating to the tax treatment of chain stores operated at a loss.

The adoption of this bill by the Congress would be a great boon to a million or more retailers throughout the Nation and an encouragement to small producers. The federation polled its members on this and the result of its Nation-wide poll was as follows: 94 percent for, 5 percent against, 1 percent not voting. We urge this committee in its report to recommend its immediate approval by the Congress.

(c) Urge Committee on Ways and Means either in this Congress or succeeding Congress, for immediate action and approval on H. R. 4407, introduced by Mr. PLOESER in the Eightieth Congress, a bill to amend sections 3400 and 3443 of the Internal Revenue Code.

The bill would correct a rank injustice as to excise taxes being levied on stocks of certain essential merchandise carried by independent retailers, and such floor tax being exempt from manufacturers of that particular industry who own and operate retail stores. The manufacturers' retail stocks are exempt of the tax until the sale is actually made to the user. To the credit of the House Small Business Committee in the Seventy-seventh Congress the committee was unanimous in recommending the correction of this discrimination levied against the independent. We urge this committee to recommend immediate action by the Ways and Means Committee in the Congress on this bill.

Mr. Chairman, it has been the position of the national federation from the first instance that if the free-enterprise system is to remain in our Nation, and if small business of this Nation is to be an important part of our Nation's economy, before anything else is done to save this situation, then all emphasis must be placed on the keynote of the entire matter, and more and more vigorous enforcement of the antitrust laws take place. When this is done, and it must be done if there is to be a future for the youth of this Nation, it will be found that more and more capital long-term investors will be willing to go into small business, and to a large degree small business will be able to finance itself and willing to stand on parity with all others, and ask no special favors or subsidy.

The foundation of this Nation, from the first instance, and its great success as a Nation was the pioneering in all branches of our economy, from the small in all lines of endeavor, and we went further as a Nation than any other in the world due to this, but, if the trend continues and is not arrested from the economic concentration that exists today in most industries, then the only result will be to end up in full Government control. There can be no other alternative.

The committee must understand that no clique in the National Federation of Small Business, Inc., shapes its policies or platform, but whatever direction we take, we take it through the democratic system that we know, through the official publication of the federation titled the "Mandate." The questions are first presented to the members and it is through their vote, and that alone that the federation takes any position on any national legislative item. At this time I would ask the privilege to insert in the record the recent Mandate released to our Nation-wide membership, which Mandate presents to its members major important questions for their consideration, which affects our whole economy in the business world, in which they should be interested in voicing their opinion, as their future is at stake.

At the same time I would ask permission of the chairman to insert in the record a copy of a message recently sent to the President of the United States for his consideration as to present high executives in the Federal Trade Commission or any other that may be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Congress for their attention and consideration.

In this statement it is our hope that our statement will not be considered our personal views and opinion, but, on the other hand, we honestly believe the views and opinions are not alone those of the members of the National Federation of Small Business, but also the views of all far-seeing, efficient small businesses of the Nation, and by Congress paying heed to these timely warnings, and adopting such a policy, we believe there will be a future for small business in this Nation, and through this the Nation will prosper, the public will profit, and, believe it or not, good big business will also gain, and, finally, the youth of this Nation will know that they will not end up as a nation of employees.

Taft-Hartley Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 31, 1948

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following article that appeared in the Advance, a semimothly publication by the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, dated December 1, 1948:

MANDATE FOR REPEAL

The same influences which were responsible for the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act are now trying to create an impression in the public mind that the coming Congress has no mandate to repeal that piece of legislation aimed at crippling the labor movement.

Interviews in the newspapers regarding the act and expressions over the radio are pointed in almost the same direction as that taken to force passage of the act.

If the English language means anything then the new Congress has a decided mandate from those who voted to repeal this reactionary legislation. For weeks upon weeks President Truman went up and down this country stating that one of the issues of the campaign was the repeal of this act. He used no weasel words in the many addresses he made regarding what should be done.

Repeal—repeal—repeal. That was the constant refrain in almost every speech that he made. No one could misunderstand the President. And when the people voted for him they voted for him in the belief that he would carry out his promise to use the powers of the Government to bring about this repeal.

What's more—no one but a chagrined and badly beaten political opposition can have any doubts but that the President meant exactly what he said.

Since his election he has again come out for repeal of the act.

It is well, right here, to examine carefully just why the reactionaries wanted to change and eventually destroy the National Labor Relations Act. They began, immediately after the act was passed, to attack it. Over 50 lawyers, the high-paid legal retainers of the reactionary employers, issued a statement that the National Labor Relations Act would be found unconstitutional by the Supreme Court. They had the impudence to advise their employers that refusal to follow the provisions of the National Labor Relations Act would carry no risks. The result was that for nearly 2 years the act was almost ineffective.

Then came the surprise to the employers. The Supreme Court found the act constitutional and a wail went up from the organized enemies of the labor movement. The NAM cried to high heaven and so did many of the chambers of commerce. The workers, however, quickly engaged in intensive organizing campaigns and the results of their efforts are now history. Starting with less than 4,000,000 organized workers at the time of the passage of the National Labor Relations Act in a very few years they had nearly 16,000,000 members, and collective bargaining, for the first time in our history, got a chance to flourish. The results today, in wages, hours, and conditions in the factories, speak for themselves.

For the first time in dealing with their employers the workers had at least an approximation of equality. From this you can see why the reactionary employers, in an attempt to destroy this equality, used their political agents in Congress to pass the Taft-Hartley Act.

Without going into too much detail, just see how the Taft-Hartley Act has operated up to now. In the first place, the elimination of a closed shop has already created chaos in the printing and maritime industries and is moving to do the same damage to other industries.

In the second place, the abolition of the closed shop has made for strikes. These strikes are already with us, and, had the election results been different from what they were, these strikes would have involved many more thousands.

Third, the Taft-Hartley Act actually protects the right to strikebreak. How was this done? By a decision outlawing peaceful picketing which the Board characterized as mass picketing. This is the first decision of this kind ever to issue from a Federal Government tribunal.

Under another ruling of the Board, employers may ask for an election when a strike is begun, and the Board holds that scabs may vote while strikers may not. The result of this is that a union is driven out of the plant.

Another provision of the act has to do with what is called a secondary boycott. This ruling prohibits refusal by a union to work on goods which may come from a shop which is struck. If the union members refused to handle struck work, they may be found to be engaged in a secondary boycott under the Taft-Hartley Act.

Let us see how this would apply to our industry. We have over 40,000 members who work in union contract shops. The work may be cut in one city and made in several union shops in other communities. The only protection that could be given any one shop is if their work is sent to a nonunion shop that they have the right to stop all the shops.

We could point out other crippling provisions, but we have dealt with sufficient of them to convince any reasonable person that the act should be repealed just as soon as the Eighty-first Congress, elected by the people, meets.

It is our guess that while the reactionaries will fight hard to prevent the repeal of the act, there is no doubt that it will go the way of other legislation opposed to the common good which the reactionary Eightieth Congress put on the statute books.

Thy Will Be Done on Earth

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES J. KERSTEN
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 31, 1948

Mr. KERSTEN of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the Social Committee of the United Nations General Assembly recently approved its Universal Declaration of Human Rights. It purports to be a Magna Carta for mankind. It seeks by agreement among nations to affirm the basic rights of every human being. If basic human rights can be set down and correctly derived in a universal agreement it may indeed be a force against war. A third world war that can wipe away unprecedented numbers of lives and reduce mankind to slavery is the dark prospect against which the declaration is drawn. But the document is a weak parchment to promote so noble a cause. I wish to set forth so as to be included in my remarks the analysis of the declaration made by Frank E. Holman, president of American Bar Association given by him in an address at Santa Barbara, Calif., September 17, 1948. Before setting forth Mr. Holman's scholarly analysis in which he points out the fact that most of those who participated in the draft of the declaration were untrained in international or any other kind of law, I wish to point out what I think is the fundamental flaw in the document.

The document purports to set out and delineate basic human rights for everyone. It does not mention the derivation of the rights it seeks to express.

Now when a man claims right or title to a piece of property ordinarily a mere affirmation of his right may be sufficient but if he is challenged, if his right it contested in the courts, he must be able to show expressly the source of his rights, his chain of title to the one who had the authority to grant it.

If a person claims a legacy under a will not only must the legatee be identified but even more important, the maker of the will must be known and the maker's power of gift acknowledged.

No right can be successfully defended before any tribunal unless the source or derivation of the right can be correctly shown. The mere affirmation is not sufficient. The mere expression or agreement by several nations—or all nations—that such and such are the rights of human beings is not sufficient to defend those rights against assault. Furthermore, if an agreement among nations is the basis for human rights, an alteration of the agreement can alter the rights.

Thus is the United Nations document basically deficient. It is a mere affirmation and spelling out of various phases of human rights: the right to life, liberty, and security of person; the right against discrimination; the dignity of the human being. It does not provide the basis for these rights so as to make them invulnerable to attack.

What becomes of the right to "life," the right to "found a family," the rights of "freedom of speech" and of "belief" when they are under real attack? What beyond the mere agreement or affirmation contained in the document shows that these are real rights? Where is the authority for these rights? Why are they inalienable by the states or any group of states? If these are inalienable rights today will they be so if the nations agree to take one or any number of them away? The basis of human rights must be founded on a firmer ground than the mutual agreement of a group of international social reformers. The authority for these rights must be presented. Their derivation must be shown.

If a man has a right to life as against the state or any combination of states the source of his life must be shown to be in his Creator.

If man has a dignity distinguishable from the rest of the animal kingdom it is by virtue of his being made in the image and likeness of his Creator.

The United Nations document speaks of the "brotherhood of man." Can you imagine a household of children wherein the children seek to set up their rights as against one another and wherein the authority of the father is forgotten? Can you have a brotherhood of man without having a fatherhood of God?

The United Nations document of human rights is a worthless paper unless it shows the real authority for the rights it seeks to proclaim.

Are we willing to water down our concept of right to life and liberty and the dignity of the human beings as contained in our Declaration of Independence? Are we willing to comprise on our concept of the nature of man and weaken our own political philosophy? The framers of our Government had the courage to set down the basis for human rights, they had the courage to say that human rights were endowed upon man by their Creator.

I am definitely opposed to the United States being a party to a world agreement that would depart from our political philosophy on a question so important pertaining to the basic rights of human beings. Many times during this past 10 years we have compromised with principle. Our leaders have done so in the case of Poland, China, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, and in many other instances. When it comes to extending compromise throughout the whole world I raise my voice in violent protest.

The bill of rights being fashioned by the social reformers is being fashioned exclusively by the will of men. The exclusive will of men will result only in conflict—in war. If men would bring peace, their will must be in compliance with the will of God. If there is to be peace in a family, the will of the children must comply with the will of the parents. If nations are to have peace the author of human rights must be acknowledged and His will must be done on earth.

Following is Mr. Holman's speech:

THE PROPOSAL FOR AN "INTERNATIONAL BILL OF RIGHTS"

(By Frank E. Holman, M. A. (Oxon.), president of the American Bar Association)

By article 62, paragraph 2, of the Charter of the United Nations, the Economic and Social Council of that body is empowered, but not required to:

"Make recommendations for the purpose of promoting respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all."

In accordance with this power to recommend, a Commission on Human Rights, as a subdivision of the Economic and Social Council, promulgated at Geneva on December 27, 1947, an International Covenant on Human Rights and an International Declaration on Human Rights—the covenant when ratified by the member nations to have the force and effect of law as to the nations adhering to it and ultimately to be implemented by an international instrumentality of enforcement; the declaration not to be a part of international law as such, but a consensus by the member nations of the political, social, and economic rights to be accorded human beings throughout the world. The drafts of the covenant and of the declaration were submitted to the member nations, and a deadline of April 3, 1948, fixed for comments and suggested changes of revisions.

Although, as indicated, it is not intended that the declaration be legally binding, it is nevertheless to be a guide for the conduct of member states and their citizens, and it has been asserted by some authorities (including Mrs. Roosevelt) that though the declaration is not technically to be legally binding, it is to be treated as an "authoritative interpretation" of what is meant by the Charter provisions of the United Nations.

In May and June, after some suggested changes by certain, but not all, member nations, the United Nations' Commission on Human Rights went ahead with its work by drafting a revised declaration, which revised declaration was published in the United Nations Bulletin of July 1, 1948. Further consideration of the covenant for the time being has been postponed. The Economic and Social Council is now studying and considering the revised declaration and if approved by that body, with or without changes, it will go to the General Assembly in Paris for action at its meeting this September. If approved there, it will be submitted to the member nations for adoption.

It is revealing to note the make-up or personnel of the commission before examining the results of its work.

Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt is its chairman and the sole United States representative—she is not a person in any sense trained in legal draftsmanship. She is primarily a social reformer.

Australia's representative is Col. William Roy Hodgson—by training a military man and from his biography a person whose experience has been largely confined to government service.

The United Kingdom's representative is Mr. Charles Dukes, a trade-unionist by profession.

These 3 are the only Anglo-Americans or representatives of English-speaking peoples on the Commission of 18 members.

As to the other 15 members of the Commission, they were as follows: Belgium, M. Fernand Dehousse; Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Mr. Alfanasi S. Stepanenko; Chile, H. E. Hernan Santa Cruz; China, Dr. P. C. Chang; Egypt, Mr. Omar Loutfi; France, Prof. Rene Cassin; India, Mrs. Hansa Mehta; Iran, Mr. Abel Ghassem Pourevaly; Lebanon, Dr. Charles Malik; Panama, Mr. Ricardo J. Alfaro; Philippine Republic, the Honorable Carlos P. Romulo; Ukranian Soviet Socialist Republic, Mr. Michael Klekovkin; Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Mr. Alexander E. Bogomolov; Uruguay, Mr. Don Jose A. Mora; Yugoslavia, Mr. Vladislav Ribnikar.

Through absences, or otherwise, certain of the above-named countries have occasionally been represented by alternates or substitute delegates.

It is this Commission which has undertaken to draft a "bill of rights" for the people of the United States which so far as the covenant is concerned is to be ratified as a treaty and under our Constitution to become the supreme law of the land and in due course implemented against all of us by the decrees of a new international court of human relations. In spite of this extraordinary and revolutionary program the press and the public and even the bar seem largely oblivious to the program and how far in certain particulars it is at variance with our fundamental concept of individual rights and freedoms and how far in other particulars it is a proposal for world-wide socialism to be imposed through the United Nations on the United States and on every other member nation.

No doubt the members of the Commission are individually sincere and high minded but their biographies show they have mostly lived by and through government jobs in their own or other countries and hence they cannot be expected to give first importance to a right like that in our own Bill of Rights of owning private property and of conducting business under a free-enterprise system. None among them can be expected as against the three Communist Russian members to fight for a provision in the covenant guaranteeing the right to private ownership of property and hence there is no such provision in the covenant.

The whole purpose of the UN organization is to achieve peace—that is to avoid war, and chiefly another world war. Though many social and economic reformers will disagree, I do not believe that either of the World Wars were caused by the absence of an international bill of rights or primarily by subnormal or abnormal social and economic conditions in any country or that a third world war would be prevented by the adoption now of a covenant and a declaration on human rights. While there is not time here to demonstrate the accuracy of this statement it may be pointed out that at the time Germany launched World War I and again when she launched World War II, Germany had the most complete social and economic program of any nation in the world, with a universal social-security system that reached practically all the citizenry and a condition of practically full employment of her people. Considerations which led Germany to instigate a war as an instrument of national policy were not the result of her people on either occasion being ill-housed, ill-fed, or ill-clothed—and even on the political side the existence of an international bill of rights would not have affected the decisions of the German people. You will notice that I say the "German people" and not the "German leaders" for I think it can be demonstrated that a majority of the German people were as enthusiastic over the idea of war as were the German leaders.

Therefore, in my opinion, we are not dealing with a proposal in this matter of a so-called international bill of rights that will assuredly contribute to world peace. We are dealing chiefly with a missionary spirit on the part of social and economic reformers who wish to establish throughout the world their social and economic ideas and in the process I believe we are risking—definitely risking, through United Nations' intervention in the domestic affairs of nations, so many international irritations and provocations as to cause us to "stop, look, and listen" and to consider whether at this particular time there should be any attempt to force a so-called international bill of rights program along the lines of the covenant and the declaration.

I would not wish anyone to think that I, or American lawyers or their bar associations, are indifferent to the definition and protection of the rights of human beings. It is one of the greatest and most important subjects that can engage the minds and efforts of men. We of the profession of law have given a large part of our lives to defending and protecting, before courts and administrative tribunals, the rights of persons and property against invasions by governments or groups—rights confirmed and vouchsafed by our own Bill of Rights. Without desire to invade, or to dictate as to the internal affairs and "domestic jurisdiction" of other countries, we believe that peace, justice, and law in the world would be promoted if the American, Canadian, and British ideals and practices of protecting basic human rights could be made world-wide. But we do not favor the approval and acceptance of something which is based on the idea that individual rights are derived from governments or the United Nations and should consist largely of grants and bounties from governments. We insist that the lawyers of North America should have an opportunity to study any proposal for an "international bill of rights" carefully before it is approved by any agency of our Government; we are opposed to anything that might be held to impair, or be a substitute for, our own cherished Bill of Rights, which protects the individual citizen against government and also in effect against arbitrary majorities and against lawless unofficial groups.

Before proceeding to a detailed examination of the covenant and the declaration and the revised declaration, I want to make a few general observations on the nature of the United Nations and the nature of a "bill of rights."

The United Nations is an organization of sovereign states pledged to international cooperation. While there are statements in its Charter which refer to the "realization of human rights and fundamental freedoms for all," the fact remains that it is an organization of states and that it operates on an international level with government meeting government. A bill of rights, on the other hand, has nothing to do directly with the relations between governments; it exists primarily to define the relations between a government or state and the individual citizens thereof; basically it relates to internal affairs and not to international matters.

In order to enforce the provisions of a bill of rights, the United Nations will have to interfere continually and minutely in the internal affairs of member nations. It will have to establish standards, and determine when and where those standards have been violated, and to take steps to correct or punish such violations.

No basic standard or system of human rights can be successfully imposed upon any nation by any other nation or group of nations or by any other outside source. Where such standards exist in the world today, they have developed as a natural expression of the overwhelming weight of opinion of the local population. They have come from the people and not from the state. Having thus before us this historical background of the experience of single nations, it appears to be clear that to attempt to confer such rights by action of an international body will be pregnant, not with world order, but with disorder.

Many sincere sponsors in the United States of an international bill of human rights contemplate only the application of American standards to foreign nations. Yet it is the reverse which will likely be true. The United States is but one nation among many, and it is inevitable that foreign standards of interpretation of these rights will be applicable to the American people; obviously the rules will be enforceable against the United States as well as against other nations. Our Bill of Rights, as construed and applied for more than a century and a half, represents our peculiar concepts of justice and propriety. I sympathize with the desire to extend the benefits of our Bill of Rights to other peoples; yet I am of the opinion that the reverse is not true and that the people of this country will emphatically not be willing to put our system to the hazard of subjecting it to the interpretation of any international organization presently existing.

It would appear that the action of the Commission in dividing its recommendations on human rights into a covenant and a declaration, and having two separate documents, was not only a feat of diplomacy but also something in the nature of salesmanship. To have included in the covenant the venturesome social and economic provisions of the declaration would have defeated all chance of any nation, like the United States, subscribing to it, but failure to have made some pronouncement of these broad social and economic declarations would not have satisfied the views of the socialistic and communistic governments. It is apparent that it was not only a compromise of views in connection with the issuance of two separate documents, but an examination of the convenant shows that it is not a bill of rights as understood by the American people. The covenant itself, in many of its affirmative provisions and by reason of its omissions and nebulous language, is also a compromise.

ANALYSIS OF THE COVENANT

The basic theory and language of a bill of rights as heretofore recognized by Americans is to impose a restraint upon government from denying to the citizens certain basic rights and hence the provisions in our own Bill of Rights are nearly all couched in the negative; for example, "Congress shall make no law" etc.; "The right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed"; "No soldier shall in time of peace be quartered," etc.

In the covenant a general affirmative duty is first placed upon every state to insure certain so-called rights and freedoms (article 2); then follow certain more or less specific restraints upon the member states. Later, as in articles 16, 17, 18, and 19, affirmative announcements of rights again appear. The difference between the affirmative and negative approach is that affirmations in broad general terms are not only more susceptible to a loose and expanding interpretation than specific negative restraints, but there is also a difference in the problem of enforcement in that to compel action is always more delicate and difficult than to restrain action.

The Department of State issued a brochure entitled "An International Bill of Human Rights." The words "bill of rights" introduced into this title would seem to be a word of salesmanship in that the American public has for several generations believed in the virtue of a bill of rights. It is a misnomer to call even the covenant a bill of rights, for as the brochure itself points out, the covenant does not pretend to include or protect many rights that our own Bill of Rights secures, namely, such elementary rights as ownership of property and free participation in government.

One of the most fundamental rights protected by our American form of government, that of private ownership of property, has been omitted. The State Department says the reason for this is that the beginning must be relatively modest; that nations will not be willing to enter into a covenant which contains rights whose definitions vary considerably in different countries. This is a rather inadequate, but revealing explanation. The true explanation doubtless is that many of the member states do not believe in the ownership of private property, but under our concept of freedom, no man can be truly free who lacks the right to own property and to participate in government, neither of which rights are included in the covenant. Perhaps in this connection one might properly quote from a speech of Senator Borah, who was himself classed not as a conservative but as a liberal:

"And what are these property rights which are guaranteed and made safe by the Constitution? What an inseparable part are they of human rights? Is not the right to acquire, own, and enjoy property a part of human rights? Is there any such thing as personal liberty without it? There is a very large portion of the human family at this time who will tell you that liberty, family happiness, and contentment were all lost in the self-same hour that they lost the right to acquire property and to be secure in its enjoyment. The framers were wise enough to know and brave enough to declare that when you have made property rights secure, you have contributed incalculably to human rights and to human liberty."

Yet our State Department, in excusing the omission from the covenant of the right to own property, says that the beginning with respect to an international bill of rights must be relatively modest.

It is also said by the State Department that the proposal for implementation of the covenant through an international court on human relations not having been included in the present covenant is not now a matter for consideration. But an examination of article 2 makes one wonder whether, if ratified by the United States, we may not be committing ourselves, morally if not legally, to the creation of some such court, for it is provided in subparagraphs (c) and (d) that "any person whose rights or freedoms are violated shall have an effective remedy, notwithstanding that the violation has been committed by persons acting in an official capacity"; and that "such remedies shall be enforceable by a judiciary whose independence is secured." Even without this direct reference and commitment regarding a new independent judiciary for enforcement, there would be considerable danger in this country first adopting the covenant and then waiting to see how the other nations proposed to have it implemented for enforcement. Subparagraph (e) implies that the police and executive officers of the United States and of each member nation would have to act as the enforcement officers of such an international court.

The broad language of article 2 is far reaching and indicates that it may be an opening wedge for all sorts of future enlargements both of substantive and procedural rights. For example, as to substantive rights, no one can know with certainty what enlargements by interpretation may result from such general language as appears in article 1 and in article 2, subparagraph (b) which assures to every person in the world such "human rights and fundamental freedoms as conform with the general principles of law recognized by civilized nations." I am aware that this latter phrase appears in the Statute of the International Court of Justice, drafted in connection with the United Nations Charter, but does anyone know what the phrase means? This phrase is without possibility of present definition. Who are the "civilized nations" and what are "the general principles of law" recognized by as many as a half dozen nations? Doubtless a scrutiny of the laws of all nations which may be asked to sign the covenant would reveal that very few had recognized all of the rights and freedoms founded on the general principles of law recognized by such a nation as the United States. As already pointed out, certain very important basic rights recognized by some of the civilized nations are entirely omitted from the covenant.

Article 3 requires the nations to supply explanations to the United Nations as to the manner in which their laws give effect to the covenant. Complying with requests for explanations may not only in itself become burdensome and irritating because it primarily concerns domestic affairs. But if the purpose of the provision is to attain some degree of uniformity among nations, we may be told, if the Communist and dictator nations muster a majority at any time in the United Nations, "You must enforce freedom our way," or we may be called upon by force of arms to compel the Communist and dictator nations to enforce our notions of freedom. The article provides no machinery for investigation by the General Assembly itself, and obviously the explanation of many nations with whom we are acquainted would not be worth the paper it was written on and would be meaningless unless backed up by an impartial investigation. All of which further demonstrates the stalemates and irritations that will be engendered by the United Nations attempting to concern itself with the internal and domestic affairs of individual nations.

In the case of a federal government like our own, our Government could be called upon to furnish all sorts of reports and explanations not only of its own conduct but the conduct of every other unit of government, such as States, counties, and cities. Under our form of government, the various local units have a certain independence and latitude in the making of local laws and ordinances. Consider for a moment the matter that arises later under article 11, subparagraph 1, guaranteeing free choice of residence. There is a considerable body of law in this country, differing in certain States, but which generally recognizes as proper, and and which a large proportion, perhaps a majority of the people, recognize as proper, that owners of property may, by agreement or grant, restrict the occupancy of certain areas, and such agreements or grants generally enhance the value of the land involved in the same way as other forms of planning or procedure with respect to land. The United States Supreme Court in a recent case has held that a State or State courts may not under the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution enforce such restrictions with respect to residence on land but that such restrictions are not un-Constitutional insofar as observed by parties voluntarily. Even in the light of the recent Supreme Court decision the United States Government should not subscribe to setting aside what has been long established and recognized as a proper restriction with respect, at least, to limited areas of property. Even in spite of the present Supreme Court decision a very large section of the population will doubtless continue to favor such covenants, and perhaps in due course achieve a change or modification in the recent adverse decision by the present Supreme Court.

Consider the innumerable explanations which might be called for in connection with Fair Employment Practices Acts. What a field day Russia would have demanding explanations for all alleged instances furnished her by Communists in this country of alleged infractions of such acts, or for that matter of the failure to have such acts—for the covenant itself, article 20, provides that there shall be no discrimination on account of "race (which includes color), sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, property status, or national or social origin."

The requesting and giving of innumerable explanations on matters which the people will view as domestic, and in many instances local issues, depending upon the character of the population, will likely result in constant irritations.

We may well ask: What becomes of the principle embodied very early in the United Nations Charter, article 2, subparagraph 7, "Nothing contained in the present Charter shall authorize the United Nations to intervene in matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any state or shall require the members to submit such matters to settlement under the present Charter"? Is the violation of this principle to be brought about through the back door of the provisions of an international bill of rights?

Section 1 of article 4 reads: "In time of war or other public emergency, a state may take measures derogating from its obligations under article 2 above to the extent strictly limited by the exigencies of the situation." Who is to be the judge of the exigencies of the situation? Article 4 affords a basis for further dissension among nations as to what extent the exigencies of the situation in war or emergency justify derogation from the general obligations under article 2. We have been in almost constant states of emergency of one kind or another since the Emergency Relief Act of 1933, under which the President by Executive order promulgated numerous emergency orders, including one that limited our right of private ownership of property by making it unlawful for private citizens to own gold. There was disagreement among our own citizens whether this action was justified. If the decision were left to other nations, disagreement on an international scale, or even war, could conceivably have resulted. At any rate it was a matter for us to decide by our own processes without interference by other nations. Even after our many years of national emergencies many of us are not sure what it takes to constitute an emergency. There would be endless dispute and dissension among the nations as to what derogations of freedom are justified by different types of emergencies.

Article 5 has to do with deprivation of life and need not here concern us.

Article 6 reads: "It shall be unlawful to subject any person to any form of physical mutilation or medical or scientific experimentation against his will." This would appear at first-hand to be entirely appropriate for any "bill of rights," but a critical consideration immediately discloses that it would constitute a definite interference with domestic law and policy. If it became the supreme law of the land by virtue of the adoption of the covenant as a treaty, our various States would be prevented from passing laws or enforcing existing laws relating to such matters as compulsory vaccination, sterilization of the insane, treatment of sexual psychopaths, and the like, either on the ground that they constitute physical mutilation or that the treatment is in the experimental stage. Sterilization of the criminally insane should be properly left open for states and nations to decide for themselves upon the basis of population, the number of the criminally insane, etc.

Article 7 need not concern us at this time.

Article 8 is similar in purpose to the thirteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, but under this article as drawn in the covenant there will arise grave differences of opinion as to what calamities and emergencies justify forced labor. For example, would the emergency of a national railroad strike affecting the well-being of the Nation be sufficient justification for compulsory labor under subparagraph 3 (b)?

Article 9, subparagraph 2, provides that no person shall be deprived of liberty except in the specific cases itemized in subparagraphs (a) to (g), inclusive. The exceptions listed appear to be appropriate, but listing these exceptions may exclude other exceptions that should be included, for example, the detention or isolation of persons having contagious diseases.

Subparagraph 5 provides for compensation in the case of unlawful arrest, but does not say who shall be liable for such compensation. It leaves the question wide open as to whether the state or only the individual involved shall respond in damages; nor is any standard set for the measures of such compensation—that is, whether it is compensatory or punitive or both.

Article 10: The language of this article may easily be construed as preventing imprisonment for contempt of court if the matter in litigation arises out of the breach of a contractual obligation. The provision would also nullify the effectiveness of decrees for specific performance in cases where such decrees are entirely just and proper under our law.

Article 11 provides for "liberty of movement and free choice of residence." The latter phrase would ban agreements and grants restricting who may reside in certain areas. Liberty of movement may include the right to trespass on private property particularly, since there is no protection in the covenant of private property or its exclusive ownership. Also "liberty of movement" might be used to justify unrestricted picketing.

Article 12 reads: "No alien legally admitted to the territory of a state shall be arbitrarily expelled therefrom." This may raise considerable difficulty for a country like the United States where foreign visitors are more or less freely admitted in the first instance on mere visitors' visas.

A foreign nation might contend that we had acted arbitrarily in expelling or deporting their spies or Communist agents or other subversive individuals. What alien shall be permitted to remain in a country should be a matter for that country to decide. On the other hand, this article is so indefinite with respect to the meaning of "arbitrarily expelled" as to be practically meaningless. The finding of a commission or government official might be deemed to be arbitrary or not to be arbitrary, depending on the country involved.

Article 13 provides that "every person is entitled to a fair hearing before an independent and impartial tribunal and to the aid of a qualified representative of his own choice." This is appropriate as far as it goes but it is inadequate. Additional safeguards should be that criminal trials be held in the district (or locality) where the crime is committed, that the accused shall not be compelled to be a witness against himself, that he be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation, that he be confronted with the witnesses against him, that he have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor and that excessive bail shall not be required.

Article 14, subparagraph 2, again refers to "the general principles of law recognized by civilized nations," a term so indefinite and meaningless at the present time as to render the whole article without effect. No one can tell which nations are referred to or how many of the so-called civilized nations must recognize a principle of law to make it controlling.

While in subparagraph 1 attempt is made to preserve the principle that no one shall be convicted under ex post facto laws, in subparagraph 2 the broad and general language (obviously to save the Nuremberg trials) would seem to undo many of the safeguards provided in the language of subparagraph 1.

Article 15 reads: "No person shall be deprived of his juridical personality." What is the meaning of "juridical personality"? Does it mean merely that individuals shall have such status as entitles them to access to the courts, or is it designed to prohibit the bill of attainder, or is it to be used to implement article 12 and give aliens a standing which they otherwise might not have?

Article 16: All of the rights given by subparagraphs 1 and 2 are limited by subparagraph 3, one important limitation being based upon public "morals". Does the article refer to the morals of the world, or of the individual nation, or of the immediate community of the person involved?

Subparagraph 1 provides that a person shall not be required to do any act which is contrary to his religious belief and its observance. What about the Doukhobors who do not like to wear clothes, or the Mormons who insisted that polygamy was a part of their religious belief and observance? In many Moslem countries it is neither contrary to law nor to morals to practice polygamy.

Our time here does not permit a further analysis of the covenant, if we are to examine the declaration and the revised declaration to any extent on this occasion. To those of you who are sufficiently interested, I may say that you are entitled to secure copies of all these documents for your own study by writing to the Department of Public Information of the United Nations at Lake Success, N. Y. The covenant and original draft of declaration were published in March 1948 issue of the ABA Journal.

THE DECLARATION

The language of the first draft of the declaration was in many respects so vague and general that it could be interpreted by the freedom-loving nations one way and another way by the dictator nations. For example, the right to own property stated in article 14 of the declaration was limited to ownership "in conformity with the laws of the state in which such propery is located." In Russia, of course, this meant ownership by the state in many instances with some right of user in common with other citizens.

For present purposes the following other examples of vagueness and generality are sufficient:

Article 1 says that all men shall act toward one another "like brothers." What legal or precise interpretation can be given to such a phrase? Cain and Abel, and Jacob and Esau, were brothers.

Article 2 speaks of "the just requirements of the democratic state." The word "democratic" has been overworked in this country which was intended to be a republic. The word "democratic" apparently means almost anything the speaker has in mind when used with reference to the rest of the world.

Article 7 contains a phrase which is novel when it requires that trials must give the defendant "all guaranties necessary to his defense." The language is too general to have any real meaning.

Subparagraphs 1 and 2 of article 7, like article 14 of the covenant, attempt to preserve the principle that no one shall be convicted under ex post facto laws, but in subparagraph 2 the broad and general language (again to save the Nuremberg trials) seems to undo many of the safeguards provided in the language of subparagraph 1.

Article 11 obviously appears to be aimed at a relaxation of immigration laws. It is obvious that this country would be the place of asylum chosen by the overwhelming majority of persons seeking refuge. Americans generally would be opposed to anything that would restrict their control over admission of immigrants.

Articles 22 to 30 undertake in general terms to impose a world-wide social and economic program and to require every nation to have a paternalistic and welfare type of government. These articles do not set forth human rights to be protected from government oppression, but they impose affirmative obligations on each state to adopt legislation promoting a general-welfare type of government (a universal Beveridge plan), and by reason of article 33, any state or person would be prevented from engaging in any activity (including freedom of speech) aimed at changing the social and economic structure of the welfare government once established. It is significant in this connection to note that the declaration contained no provision for its ever being amended.

THE REVISED DECLARATION

The present revision of the declaration discloses as did the preceding declaration, that the drafters have very little appreciation of the historical fact that the basic purpose of a bill of rights is to protect the individual citizen from the encroachments of his own government and leave him as free as possible to work out his social and economic destiny according to his own talents and desserts. The first 19 articles of the revised draft constitute an attempt to follow the traditional pattern of a bill of rights, but the provisions are phrased in such vague and general terms as to be incapable of legal definition and easily capable of different interpretation by the peoples of different political backgrounds. Totalitarian governments will not read or interpret these 19 articles in the same manner as we understand them.

The latter articles, 20 to 27, inclusive, constitute an agreement to adopt the New Deal on an international scale by committing the member nations to a paternalistic form of government which would attempt to care for all the daily needs of the citizen, and minimize the incentive for individual initiative and progress. These latter articles do not pretend to limit the powers of government, but on the contrary, impose so-called economic and social duties upon government—the fulfillment of which will require a planned economy and a control by government of individual action. This program, if adopted and approved by the member nations, will promote state socialism, if not communism, throughout the world. There is, therefore, the same inconsistency between the first portion and the last portion of the revised declaration as there was in the original declaration, the first portion attempting to deal with the protection of rights and freedoms as against government, whereas the implementation of the latter portion will tend to cast the peoples of the world into a common social and economic mold within which everything is to be supplied by a paternalistic government upon an equalized basis and, to a large extent, regardless of individual effort.

The revised draft has been advertised as shorter and as an improvement. It is shorter but an analysis discloses a rearrangement and change of wording but no real net improvement.

Article 1 is the same as article 1 of the previous draft except that people are enjoined to act toward one another in a spirit of brotherhood instead of like brothers. In making this change the Commission has accepted the fact that brothers sometimes quarrel. This provision regarding brotherhood, however phrased, is too vague to satisfy our concept of a bill of rights of imposing actual restraints on government.

Article 2 is the same as article 3 (1) of the previous draft, that everyone is entitled to the rights and freedoms set forth in the declaration without distinction as to race, color, sex, religion, etc.

Article 3 is the same as article 4 of the previous draft. It recognizes the right to life, liberty, and security of person, but does not recognize as coequal with these rights the right to own property and be secure in its enjoyment.

Later, in article 15, the right to own property alone as well as in an association with others as stated, and this is an improvement on article 14 of the original draft—but in neither draft is there any protection against the expropriation of private property without due process and just compensation.

Article 4 is comparable to article 8 and article 7 (3) in the previous draft.

Article 5, providing that everyone has the right to recognition as a person before the law, is found in article 12 of the previous draft, but the right to enjoyment of fundamental civil rights found in article 12 of the previous draft for some unkown reason is omitted in the revised draft.

Article 6 of the revised draft is similar to article 3 (2) of the previous draft.

Article 7 of the revised draft is similar to article 5 of the previous draft, in that it prohibits arbitrary arrest and detention. In the previous draft provision was made against deprivation of personal liberty, except in cases prescribed by law and after due process, and for immediate judicial determination of the legality of any detention, and trial within a reasonable time. The previous draft afforded better safeguards.

Article 8 of the revised draft is an abbreviation of article 6 of the previous draft, providing for trials of criminal charges. The revised draft omits the provision for aid by a qualified representative of the accused's choice. Here again the previous draft afforded better safeguards, though these were also inadequate.

Article 9 is comparable to article 7 (1) of the previous draft. The provision that the accused shall be given all guaranties necessary for his defense seems to be too vague for practical application. The provision found in the previous draft, that the accused shall not be liable to any greater punishment than that prescribed for such offense by law in force at the time the offense was committed, is omitted from the revised draft. This provision should be restored else there is no protection against ex post facto laws. By omitting this provision the commission cleverly avoided the necessity of trying to save the Nuremberg trials and hence paragraph 2 of article 7 of the previous draft, which was apparently included to uphold the war crimes trials, is not found in the revised draft.

Article 10 is comparable to article 9 of the previous draft.

Article 11 of the revised draft provides for freedom of movement and of residence within the borders of each state and the right to leave any country. These rights were expressed in article 10 of the previous draft, but made subject to general laws not contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations Charter, adopted for reasons of security or in the general interest. The previous draft also contained a provision that individuals have the right to acquire the nationality of any country willing to grant it. This provision is expressed somewhat differently in article 13 of the revised draft, which provides that no one shall be arbitrarily deprived of nationality or denied the right to change his nationality. The previous draft went further, in article 15, by placing persons who do not enjoy the protection of any government under the protection of the United Nations.

Article 12 of the revised draft, similar to article 11 of the previous draft, provides that everyone has the right to seek and be granted, in other countries, asylum from persecution. This provision, if respected in the United States, would appear to nullify immigration laws and open the gates wide to anyone claiming persecution. Certainly the majority of Americans will not favor unrestricted immigration or the making of this country an unrestricted asylum for the persecuted from all over the world.

There is not time to deal specifically with all the remaining articles. They are in one way or another a revampi g of various provisions in the previous draft. But I do want to comment on two or three of the remaining articles.

Article 20 is comparable to article 26 of the previous draft and contemplates again worldwide adoption of the New Deal.

Article 21 incorporates the provisions of articles 23 and 24 of the previous draft, giving everyone the right to work under favorable conditions, the right to equal pay for equal work and the right to join tradeunions. In the previous draft the right to pay was at least based upon and measured by ability and skill.

Article 22 combines the ideals expressed in articles 25 and 26 of the previous draft and gives everyone the right to enjoy a high standard of living, including food, clothing, housing, and medical care supplied by a paternalistic government; and, under article 24, everyone is given the right to rest and leisure. There is no indication in the declaration how this ideal existence is to be financed in the even everyone takes advantage of the provisions of these articles.

Article 26 provides that everyone is entitled to a good social and international order. It is a wonderful idea, but it will take more than a declaration by the United Nations to settle the conflicts between the totalitarian states and the rest of the world, and to restore international order.

Article 28 is the same as article 33 of the previous draft and is a general provision that nothing in the declaration shall imply that any state or person may engage in any activity aimed at the destruction of any of the rights and freedoms described therein. Does this mean that every state and person will be prevented from engaging in any activity (including freedom of speech) aimed at changing the social and economic structure of the welfare government once established? It is significant in this connection to note the revised declaration also contains no provision for amendment.

As pointed out, it is not contemplated that the revised declaration will require ratification by the member nations according to their respective constitutional processes. In the United States the President could accept the declaration without any action by the Congress as a whole or even by the Senate. Doubtless any nation that accepts it or even votes for it in the Assembly will be expected to live up to it and enforce it and may later find itself in the difficulty of being asked and expected to ratify a convenant containing similar provisions for the promotion of a welfare type of government. For as a part of the program of the Commission, it is still contemplated that measures or machinery for implementation will be set up and that in due course a revised covenant will be proposed for ratification as a convention to give it the force of law. The chairman of the Commission, Mrs. Roosevelt, substantially so announces the program in the July 1948 issue of the United Nations Bulletin at page 521.

In order that there may be a fair disclosure to the American people of the provisions and purposes of the so-called International Bill of Rights as represented by the Convenant on Human Rights and the declaration and revised declaration now pending before the General Assembly, I have concluded to ask the Board of Governors of the American Bar Association for authority, under the sponsorship of the Committee on Peace and Law through United Nations, to conduct at least 10 regional conferences throughout the United States, as soon as the preparatory work can be done and arrangements made, to develop and secure a consensus to aid in disclosing to the American people the true nature and character of the program. I am advised that the Canadian Bar Association proposes to call similar regional conferences.

The Director of the Division of Human Rights of the United Nations, Mr. John P. Humphrey, in an article in the January 1948 issue of the Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, himself admits that what the Commission is now proposing constitutes an intervention in matters "within the domestic jurisdiction" of the member states. He exposes the whole revolutionary nature of the program by boldly stating:

"What the United Nations is trying to do is revolutionary in character. Human rights are largely a matter of relationships between the state and individuals, and therefore a matter which has been traditionally regarded as being within the domestic jurisdiction of states. What is now being proposed is, in effect, the creation of some kind of supernational supervision of this relationship between the state and its citizens."

Such a program will necessarily produce inevitable conflicts with local law and the internal social and economic conditions in the member nations. These conflicts (even though only matters of interpretation) will likely result in continuous international irritations and provocations.

Moreover, the proposal has serious implications with respect to our form of government. In the United States laws affecting the citizens' life, liberty, and property are passed by established agencies of representative government, to wit: by the Senate and House of Representatives or by the State legislature, whereas the proposal involved in an "International Bill of Rights" is that by and through the use of a treaty, or even without that, and simply by and through an adoption of a declaration by the United Nations Assembly and approval by the President and State Department, the fundamental rights and liberties of the citizens of this country and their definition would be declared, and in effect legislated for them, without their having any voice about it, either by their own votes or through the votes of their duly elected representatives. This is a dangerous, far-reaching, and revolutionary change in the processes of constitutional government—the importance of which seems to have been overlooked, in spite of the fact that the revolutionary character of the proposal has been openly admitted by the proponents of the program including the Director of the Division of Human Rights himself.

CONCLUSIONS

It is the immediate and important duty of lawyers to study and analyze, before it is too late, these proposals for "an International Bill of Rights" and their anticipated implementation by a new World Court on Human Relations, and explain to the American people the revolutionary nature of the proposals and the dangerous implications with respect to our form of government. Let the American people then decide and make known to the President and the State Department whether they approve the present or any program for an international bill of rights, which Mr. Humphrey, by the way a distinguished Canadian, says is "revolutionary in character" and involves "the creation of some kind of supernational supervision" of the relationship of a state to its own citizens.

Looking Back at 10 Years in Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE H. BENDER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 31, 1948

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, the 10-year period beginning in 1939 and ending this week has been one of the most crucial in world history. European civilization as we knew it has been shattered. The process of governmental change ushered in by the First World War has been shifted from an emphasis upon the republican form to new forms modeled in the image of socialism. France, Italy, and Great Britain, the "strong" states of western Europe, have become, unwillingly, temporarily dependent upon Uncle Sam. In Asia the political situation has deteriorated incredibly since the days when Sun Yat-sen first unfurled the banner of republicanism in China. Here at home we have not escaped the tremendous impact of the European war and its aftermath of world chaos.

Whatever else it may become, the first half of the twentieth century is already marked for the historian's pen as one of the decisive eras of world history. In the last decade alone the improvement of air transport, the perfection of radar, and the discovery of nuclear fission have portended a new world of incredible possibilities. Television, low-cost aviation for private use, are right around the corner—if we can establish peace.

Looking back at these past 10 years as a Member of the United States House of Representatives, it is my conviction that we are on the verge of the most momentous decisions in world affairs. It is fantastic to think that any responsible public officials anywhere should even think in terms of another war. All of the men and women in every land on the globe are appalled at the very thought of war; it must not happen. We must not permit our statesmen or the statesmen of any other country to blunder into an atomic conflict. This must be our primary concern in the years ahead—strength at home and peace abroad.

Great Need for Solidarity and Friendship Among Nations of Western Hemisphere

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RICHARD F. HARLESS
OF ARIZONA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 31, 1948

Mr. HARLESS of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, on this occasion, I bid my many friends in the House of Representatives farewell.

For 6 years, it has been my privilege to be associated in the House of Representatives with men and women of the highest quality from every section of our Nation. In taking leave of this association, it is with sadness that I must say adieu. I shall look forward to future personal associations with many of the friends that I have made on Capitol Hill.

Before I leave the House of Representatives, I want to make one brief observation. We are now in a world torn by conflict. Suspicion and fear prevail everywhere. In our ardent desire to preserve peace in the world, we are lending every effort to aid the countries of Europe in their struggle for recovery. This, I believe, is desirable and worth while. However, I wish to call the attention of my colleagues in the House of Representatives to the great need for solidarity and friendship among the nations of the Western Hemisphere.

I have just returned from a visit to Mexico. We have a friend in our neighbor to the south; however, this friendly nation is having a tremendous economic struggle, and it seems to me that in our anxiety to help Europe we are neglecting a friend that might be needed in the very near future.

President Miguel Aléman has extended a hand of cordiality to us. He has shown a sincere desire to cooperate in every way for a better relationship between Mexico and the United States of America. I trust that we will not neglect his hand extended in friendship but will grasp it and make the most of this spirit of cooperation.

I especially want to congratulate President Aléman on appointing as the new Ambassador of Mexico to the United States Don Rafael de la Colina. The new envoy to our country understands American problems, and I know that he will help to foster a spirit of friendly relations between these two Republics.

At this particular time the economy of Mexico could be given a much needed impetus if the United States would cooperate with our friend to the south in developing her petroleum resources. Mexico needs our dollars, and we need her petroleum. Time is of the essence in the development of this resource, not only for the salvation of the economy of Mexico but for our own national defense. Often we have spoken of the good-neighbor policy with our friends in Latin America. Mexico leads among all the Latin-American countries. We can enhance our good-neighbor policy among all the countries in Central and South America by helping Mexico develop her petroleum resources. For our future security there is great need for hemispheric solidarity. At this crucial moment we should not neglect either Canada to the north or Mexico to the south.

Although I must leave my duties in the greatest democratic body on earth, I trust that my colleagues will carry on a spirit of friendship and good will among our neighbors to the north and south.

Forty-six Years of Service by J. N. Heiskell Praised by Editor and Publisher

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BROOKS HAYS
OF ARKANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 31, 1948

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, today I would like to pay tribute to a man and to a newspaper which that man has built through 46 years of attention and effort into a powerful force for good in my native State of Arkansas.

I refer to Mr. J. N. Heiskell and the Arkansas Gazette, the oldest newspaper west of the Mississippi River. Known affectionately as the Old Lady the Gazette wields a strong influence in all phases of Arkansas life and it has battled constantly to bring enlightenment and progress to the State.

Recently Editor and Publisher, the trade publication of the newspaper business, carried a well deserved tribute to Mr. Heiskell, and under leave to revise and extend my remarks, I am pleased to include excerpts from this article in the RECORD:

Arkansas, since the turn of the century, has done much to shake off its reputation as a hillbilly hang-out and establish itself as a State of balanced industry and agriculture. It is impossible to measure the part John Netherland Heiskell, 76, has played in that transformation.

But as editor of the Arkansas Gazette since he and two others purchased it in 1902, his voice has been heard often and strongly through his editorial columns. Those editorials, until recently, often written in longhand, have needled a reluctant politician, chastised an irresponsible corporation, or spanked inefficient law enforcement officers whenever he thought Arkansas was losing anything because of the actions of anyone.

By the same token, he has handed out praise and editorial cooperation to those persons and those institutions he believed were contributing to the State's progress.

One of his earliest series of criticisms was leveled against colorful and powerful Arkansas Gov. Jeff Davis, the only man to hold the State's highest office for three terms and who Heiskell now says had the most powerful personality and best machine of any Arkansas politician during his lifetime.

Heiskell's blasts against Davis, begun soon after he came to the Gazette, were aroused because of Davis-sponsored State antitrust legislation which eventually caused all fire insurance companies to leave the State. Heiskell insisted the laws were too stringent. His stand was upheld when subsequent modifying legislation was enacted.

But his final answer came in a unique way when the then Senator Davis died in office January 3, 1913. Governor Donaghey forthwith appointed Heiskell to fill the short, incomplete term from January 6 to 29. Heiskell is probably the only former United States Senator not now known by that title.

PHILOSOPHY IN SENATE

Although his Senate term was the second shortest in history, his combination maiden-farewell address achieved national notice. In it he revealed his editorial and personal philosophy.

Referring to his constituents "dubbed with the uncouth terms of 'redneck' and 'hillbilly,'" he said they are "the very foundation course of the strength of human society, who work at the trades of the countryside or cultivate small farms in the sweat of their own brows, whose greatest interests in this world are home, family, school, and their country."

"If these men are misled, the fault is not so much with them as with him who perverts his talents and abuses his powers to play upon their honest hearts and open minds," he said.

* * * * *

"I'LL BELIEVE IT IN THE GAZETTE"

His insistence on accurate, detailed reporting in his paper has led to the samewhat common saying in Arkansas (the Gazette has a State-wide circulation) that "I'll believe it when I see it in the Gazette."

The tall, lean, and scholarly Heiskell believes a newspaper thrives on competition. His belief in this is so strong that when he acquired the Little Rock afternoon paper, the Arkansas Democrat, some years ago, he quickly disposed of it and divorced the Gazette from any control. He does not even recall the date of the event now.

He frowns on disinterested corporate control of newspapers and has turned down several prospective buyers for his largely because he has felt they will not give the paper the "soul" he believes it now has. He has described himself to his family as the "conscience" of the Gazette.

Although reared in the old-school South, Heiskell indicated he did not intend to overlook the younger, more liberal tendency of the area when he hired Harry Ashmore as editor of the editorial page. Although Ashmore brought down the bitter ire of many wealthy and influential Arkansans when he become personally identified with the Gazette's fight against the States' Rights Democrats and for equal opportunities (within segregation) for Negroes, Heiskell has backed him completely. His faith in Ashmore was perhaps indicated when he recently named him executive editor.

COMPLEMENTARY FORCES

Heiskell and Ashmore are complementary editorial forces. They are often observed painstakingly going over each other's editorials and the best in each, tempered by the influence of the other, is generally regarded as the result.

Heiskell's office is unbelievably cluttered with studies on every facet of Arkansas and United States history. His wife once urged him to clean it up "because it's positively unhealthy."

"Yes, I guess that's why I died so young," still-spry Heiskell is said to have replied.

* * * * *

Heiskell has been a newspaperman for 55 years, having gone to work as a reporter in Knoxville, Tenn., following his graduation from the University of Tennessee. He progressed through work as city editor of several southern dailies, to Louisville (Ky.) AP bureau chief and thence to the Gazette which he has edited for the past 46 years.

Socialized Medicine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES J. KERSTEN
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 31, 1948

Mr. KERSTEN of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I wish to include within my remarks the address of Dr. L. J. Van Hecke, president of the Milwaukee County Medical Society, made by him on December 9, 1948, on the subject of socialized medicine:

One year ago, sitting in this very room, I had two disturbing emotions. One was that some of my close friends, knowing me better than the rest, might have started a merciful filibuster from the floor, and might have made my election impossible. This obviously failed. The other was one of near horror at the prospect of what was being said from the platform coming true. The speaker, you will recall, painted a starry-eyed socialist's view of what was almost certain to occur. The picture was made doubly gloomy by the almost credible manner of the speaker who almost confined himself to a factual recital of what was taking place in other parts of the world. However, when he got down near to the position of saying we could deduce from what was interpreted as progress in Sweden and New Zealand what our course would likely be, he could not help saying, in effect, that we ought to go and do likewise. That talk hurt. Had he been brought here to tell us the worst?

As the year progressed so did the political scenery here in America, and by the time of the AMA Convention in Chicago, the bigger side-show in Philadelphia put on by the GOP was in full swing. Some of us, seeking relief from the heat in the cool, dark cellars, listened to the radio and felt strengthened in our belief that America must soon stop this headlong flight into socialism.

Perhaps my own little short regime in the Medical Society would be fraught with things hardly more serious than quarrels with other doctors—really never a bad sort of scrap. We doctors have always gone all out for intramural argument, knowing that this is almost a certain way to progress. I have frequently warned nosey but well-meaning laymen not to be disturbed when doctors snarl at each other. We ought to undertake a public education campaign to assure others that all this is part of our great tradition of individualism.

I mentioned individualism as the banner and code of the physician. Pity—pity the practitioner of England today—some of the world's finest minds, traditionally nurtured on contest and scientific argument—left to decay in predigested orders from a Socialist government authority. The time is sure to come when an English doctor would look back on intraprofessional quarrels as a time of happy contentions, lost youth never more to be seen.

It was from listening to a Mr. Elmo Roper that I became pleasantly narcotized into thinking that the coming year might even be an easy one. In this bland state I had about 50 million bedfellows, many of whom couldn't even be stirred out of bed to get to the polls. I have no hesitancy in saying that the result was tragic—and yet—it may be the thing that brings us all to our damn senses. There's nothing like clearing away the sum of confusion to confront your adversary in the stark light of unmodified opposition. We can do nothing but vigorously oppose the trend. There has to be someone to stand up and shout "You're a damned liar" at Oscar Ewing. It strikes me that in response to the Ewings, and other Socialists—aiming at pap feeding a nation into somnolence—aiming at something more sinister than even they realize, we have resorted too solidly to cold logic. It is a shame to think that there is a temptation to depart from the cold logical reasoning in which the physician is trained, and resort to some old fashioned tub-thumping. But our position in such matters is entirely too honestly unglamorous. And how does it happen that the physician is forced to defend his very defense of health? What kind of perverted English language has got this thing around to the point where "health" sounds like something we are against? Such irresponsibility before recorded truth and history! The record of American medicine in its struggle to prolong human life is the most brilliant star in the country's flag. Haziness as to differentiating "health" and so-called health legislation is apparently intended to confuse the public into believing an untruth—that we are a most unhealthy people—this is a patent, irresponsible lie, and the people who dish out this nonsense know it.

In order to trifle with health, a person must demonstrate his responsibility. To trifle with the stock market one needs only to show his responsibility on a financial statement. Now who can trifle with health? Your neighbor who offers a prescription over the fence? The casual acquaintance, the pseudo-scientist, the student nurse, the senior medic? It seems that everyone has that Samaritan quality until—until it comes to taking the blame for such a tragedy as a death.

Don't these know-it-all people, who glibly speak of saving lives, know that they may very well, in the light of history, actually be responsible for many deaths? I can guarantee that under Government patronage medicine will decay and decline. The very well-being of our patients automatically will decay and decline as in Europe. For these reasons the powerfully influential public press ought, sincerely, to back the doctor in his now pathetically defensive position. The very basis of American freedom is at stake. Can you twist the kind of reasoning that Senator MURRAY dished out criticizing the AMA for seeking to fight his bill? If MURRAY had a grain of sense of responsibility for the flight into socialism that he started he would reach into his pocket and subscribe to the AMA fund.

I would like to ask who, in all honesty, can point to a Government agency, even with the advantage of never having to show a profit, which, in straight competition, could not be licked to a frazzle by free enterpise? Who thinks that the Government can even run an insurance agency? Only the other day on the radio it was announced that millions of insurance dollars will be returned to veterans who have overpaid bacause the experience tables that the Government agency has been working on were based on material from the last century.

In medicine, let us ask ourselves, who really brought the care of the war wounded up to date? Something was brought to the Army and Navy when they asked our fresh competitive minds to join them in solving some war problems.

No! We will have nothing of Government control. We are opposed to the Wagner-Murray-Dingle affair and all similar Truman programs—but who are we? Here is where I think we may have gained by the November fiasco. It has been brought out crystal-clear that when we have opposed state medicine, as has often been said, it is not our own hides that we are worried about. All of a sudden, many people begin to fear socialism. Incidentally, we may as well bury the words "Democratic Party." The title is a fake and a subterfuge. Let me read the exact words of an editorial in the Milwaukee Sentinel directly after the November election:

"The outstanding fact is that the American people, whether they consciously willed it so or not, have voted for socialism under another name.

"Mr. Truman is not a professional Socialist himself.

"But the doctrines which he has advocated, and must be expected to advocate again, are Socialist doctrines.

"Mr. Truman wants, and has advocated, socialized medicine.

"Mr. Truman wants, and has advocated, Federal housing.

"Mr. Truman wants, and has advocated, federalized education.

"Mr. Truman wants, and has advocated, a Federal power industry.

"Mr. Truman wants, and has advocated, Federal regional valley authorities, along the lines of the TVA, covering the entire country.

"Mr. Truman wants, and has advocated, Federal control of employment services.

"Mr. Truman wants, and has advocated, the restoration of the Wagner Act which made labor a political pawn.

"Mr. Truman wants, and has advocated, subsidized agriculture, which has proved its political efficacy.

"Mr. Truman wants, and has advocated, demagogic taxation and punitive measures against productive free enterprise.

"The sum total of it will be socialism.

"And socialism, which is the blight of Europe, came to Europe in the same indirect way.

"It was not the Socialists, but the imperialist Bismarck, who introduced socialism into Germany.

"It was not the Socialists, but the liberals under Asquith and Lloyd George, who put Great Britain on the road to socialism.

"So it is the Democrats and not the Socialists who have committed America to socialism.

"We Americans have made our choice.

"We might just as well recognize what we have chosen."

Does this show where we stand? And by the same token, can any physician hold in his heart sympathy toward other governmental controls? Herein lies the test of his sincerity with only one exception. The commodity in which he deals is human life itself. A pock on political grifters who will trifle with any man's life—an incurable pock, and let them take the blame of the generations to come; for unless the light prevails during the next 2 years, it may take 25 to discover our error.

Then, Doctor, a pock be upon us if we have failed to get interested enough to oppose this thing with vigor. That little nap in November has to be paid for by staying wide awake for two more years. I say 2 years for this is the shortest possible time within which we can change the legislative body of our Government to one which is avowedly, traditionally American, and let us not be ashamed of our public efforts in this behalf.

Help to keep ourselves and our charges—the well and the ill of this country—awake enough to throw the rascals out. Read all you can about the things that relate to Government control so that when the time comes to give an answer our ranks will be solidly straight, our position will be clear and strong, that as we have fought all disease we will fight this newer social one. And who thinks we are afraid?

Report of Legislative Activity and Field Studies Made by Committee on Public Lands of the Eighteth Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RICHARD J. WELCH

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 31, 1948

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I include in the RECORD a history of legislative activity and field studies made by the Committee on Public Lands of the Eighteth Congress.

The Committee on Public Lands, of which I am chairman, has been one of the most active committees of the Eighteth Congress. A total of 671 bills and resolutions was referred to the committee for consideration. The committee and its various subcommittees held more than 325 hearings and meetings and favorably reported a total of 274 bills and resolutions, 223 of which were enacted into law.

Under the Congressional Reorganization Act of 1946, six former legislative committees were consolidated into the present Committee on Public Lands. To facilitate action on the diverse and varied legislative matters within its jurisdiction, the committee chairman appointed five subcommittees, as follows:

Subcommittee on Public Lands: Chairman, Hon. FRANK A. BARRETT, of Wyoming; Subcommittee on Irrigation and Reclamation: Chairman, Hon. ROBERT F. ROCKWELL, of Colorado; Subcommittee on Territorial and Insular Possessions: Chairman, Hon. FRED L. CRAWFORD, of Michigan; Subcommittee on Mines and Mining: Chairman, Hon. WILLIAM LEMKE, of North Dakota; and Subcommittee on Indian Affairs: Chairman, Hon. WESLEY A. D'EWART, of Montana.

The Congressional Reorganization Act authorized the appointment of four professional staff members in addition to six clerical staff members. Because of the familiarity of the members of the committee with problems involved under the committee's jurisdiction, many of whom live in the geographic areas affected, the chairman and the committee were of the unanimous opinion that except in special instances professional staff members would be of little value to the committee unless they undertook expensive field investigations. Such investigations would have cost an additional amount equivalent to their salaries. By employing an exceptionally well-qualified clerical staff and one professional staff member—the latter, during 1948 only—the committee effected a saving of the taxpayers' money in the amount of almost $175,000. In keeping with the purpose and intent of the Reorganization Act, a vacancy was kept in the clerical staff for the entire Eightieth Congress for the ranking minority member.

It was decided that instead of employing the maximum staff, members of the committee personally would conduct field studies of the important problems under the jurisdiction of the Committee on Public Lands. To carry out this program, I requested and the House authorized an appropriation of $25,000.

During the recess following the first session of the Eightieth Congress, 20 hearings were conducted by the full committee and the subcommittees in California, Colorado, Washington, Wyoming, Montana, Nevada, and Alaska. Further field investigations were made during the second session. Notwithstanding the allowance of $25,000, the committee expended only $14,323.61—slightly more than one-half of the amount authorized and appropriated—for the payment of all costs, including stenographic transcripts of hearings in the field and members' traveling expenses.

The 671 measures referred to the Committee on Public Lands during the Eightieth Congress were as follows:

House bills	548
House joint resolutions	23
House resolutions	4
Senate bills	89
Senate joint resolutions	7
Total	671

Of this total, 223 were enacted into law—185 public and 38 private laws. An additional 41 received favorable committee action, with 22 pending in the House and 19 pending in the Senate on August 7, 1948, when the Eightieth Congress adjourned. Two House resolutions were also agreed to.

One hundred and eighty-two bills were tabled by the committee or were not considered because they were identical to other measures, were superseded for reasons of parliamentary procedure by Senate measures, or were revised and reintroduced as new bills.

In addition to the bills and resolutions referred to the Committee on Public Lands, nine House documents were submitted to the committee for attention. One hundred and fifteen executive communications, principally from Government department heads, as well as 118 memorials and petitions from various sources, were referred to the committee.

The scope of the committee's activities can best be noted from the following résumé of some of the major bills reported by each subcommittee. All of the bills described were approved by the full committee and were favorably reported to the House.

SUBCOMMITTEE ON PUBLIC LANDS

Two hundred and eighteen bills were referred to the Subcommittee on Public Lands, which has jurisdiction over public lands generally, forest reserves and national parks created from the public domain, military parks and battlefields, national cemeteries, and preservation of prehistoric ruins and objects of interest on the public domain. Among the bills considered and approved by this subcommittee during the Eightieth Congress were three of particular interest to veterans—H. R. 603, to amend an act of September 27, 1944, relating to credit for military or naval service in connection with certain homestead entries; H. R. 4059, to provide for the settlement of certain parts of Alaska by war veterans; and H. R. 5244, to amend an act entitled "An act to allow credit in connection with certain homestead entries for military or naval service rendered during World War II."

Eight measures approved by the subcommittee and full committee provided for the establishment of new national parks or monuments. These included the Theodore Roosevelt National Park in North Dakota, H. R. 731; Independence National Historical Park in Philadelphia, Pa., H. R. 5053; Pensacola National Monument, Fla., H. R. 3416; De Soto National Memorial, Fla., H. R. 4023; Saratoga National Historical Park, N. Y., H. R. 5822; Vancouver National Monument, Wash., H. R. 5957; Francis Scott Key National Monument, District of Columbia, House Joint Resolution 150; and Fort Sumter National Monument, S. C., Senate Joint Resolution 94.

Another 19 measures provided for enlargement of existing national parks or recreational areas and facilitated the administration thereof.

The Public Lands Committee, through the Subcommittee on Public Lands, devoted considerable time to a study of problems in connection with our public domain lands and particularly to the question of proposed reduction in the number of livestock permitted to graze in the national forests.

Extensive hearings were held on these matters in Washington, D. C., and throughout the Western States. The committee findings were reported to the House in Report No. 2456, Eightieth Congress, second session.

SUBCOMMITTEE ON IRRIGATION AND RECLAMATION

Eighty-five bills were referred to the Subcommittee on Irrigation and Reclamation. The subcommittee made a careful study of the repayment provisions of the Federal reclamation laws and reported two bills embodying certain amendments thereto.

The subcommittee also reported bills expediting the completion of the All-American Canal in California, H. R. 3348, and the Deer Creek division of the Provo River project in Utah, S. 1990. Other bills reported by the subcommittee included measures facilitating the operation of the Gila Federal Reclamation project in Arizona, S. 483; the Northport Irrigation District in Nebraska, H. R. 6067; and the Carlsbad Federal reclamation project in New Mexico, S. 2286.

The Committee on Public Lands, through its Subcommittee on Irrigation and Reclamation, reported two House resolutions important to the future of the West. Both were introduced by me. The first called for the initiation of investigations looking to the provision of additional water for southern California and the Colorado River Basin, House Resolution 244, and the second authorized studies by a joint board of Army, Navy, and Reclamation engineers to investigate and report on the feasibility from the standpoint of national defense and other beneficial purposes of the conservation of fresh water at the northerly end of San Francisco Bay, House Resolution 618. Studies are now being made on this important matter under the authority of this latter resolution.

Three new and important reclamation projects were authorized by the Subcommittee on Irrigation and Reclamation. They were the Paonia project, Colorado, H. R. 3143; the Preston Bench project, Idaho, S. 1987; and the Kennewick division of the Yakima project, Washington, H. R. 4954.

The subcommittee very carefully investigated and held hearings on the very important American River reclamation and conservation project in California, including the construction of the Folsom Dam. As a result of the testimony adduced in these hearings, I introduced new legislation, H. R. 7124, in the closing days of the Eightieth Congress to carry forward this important project. It is my purpose to reintroduce this legislation in the Eighty-first Congress.

Likewise, extensive hearings were held on the Solano project, California—H. R. 5927—a project very vital to our national defense agencies on the Pacific coast. As a result of these hearings, carefully considered legislation will be introduced in the Eighty-first Congress to solve this problem.

SUBCOMMITTEE ON TERRITORIAL AND INSULAR AFFAIRS

The Subcommittee on Territorial and Insular Affairs had 93 bills and resolutions referred to it. No report of activities of the Committee on Public Lands during the Eightieth Congress would be complete without inclusion of the important legislation affecting the Nation's territorial and insular possessions. The full committee held lengthy hearings on the various bills providing statehood for Hawaii and unanimously reported H. R. 49 to the House. The Subcommittee on Territorial and Insular Affairs approved statehood for Alaska legislation, H. R. 5666, which was unanimously reported to the House by the full committee.

Another important measure reported by this subcommittee was one enabling the people of Puerto Rico to elect their governor. Heretofore the governor has been appointed by the President. In the 1948 election, the Puerto Ricans for the first time in history elected their governor. The committee feels that this legislation offered a constructive example of democracy in action for other peoples of the world.

This subcommittee also held extensive hearings on the subject of the economy of the Virgin Islands and reported a bill providing for the incorporation of the Virgin Islands Corporation, thus affording economic aid to the islands and designated to make the Virgin Islands self-supporting.

SUBCOMMITTEE ON MINES AND MINING

Fifty-eight bills and resolutions were referred to the Subcommittee on Mines and Mining. The subcommittee gave considerable attention to a thorough and careful study of the problems facing domestic producers of strategic and critical minerals and metals. Hearings were held over a period of many months on this exceedingly important matter. It was for this project that a technical staff member was employed. As a result of these hearings, two bills were reported to the House by the full Committee on Public Lands that were designed to stimulate the production and conservation of the important ores, metals, and minerals vitally needed in our national economy and our national defense program. Witnesses from both industry and Government testified before the subcommittee to tell of the problems involved in the Nation's stock-piling plans for national defense. Particular emphasis was laid on the study of manganese, chromite, copper, tungsten, and mercury. The committee feels that these investigations have provided badly needed information on the Nation's mineral resources, and urges that further studies on additional metals be made during the Eighty-first Congress.

SUBCOMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS

The Subcommittee on Indian Affairs had 217 bills and resolutions referred to it. While most of these bills dealt with local situations facing the various Indian tribes and reservations throughout the country, they required a great deal of time and study for their proper consideration. All of the problems facing the Indians of the United States come under the jurisdiction of this subcommittee of the Committee on Public Lands.

Because of the serious situation existing among the Navajo and Hopi Indians in Arizona and New Mexico, the committee held hearings on the reservation. I introduced legislation authorizing an appropriation for the immediate relief of these Indians, H. R. 4627, which was not only favorably reported by the Committee on Public Lands but which was enacted into law. As a result of this authorizing legislation an appropriation was made for the immediate relief of these Indians, and the subcommittee later reported a measure designed to establish a long-range program for the rehabilitation of the Navajo and Hopi Indians, H. R. 6630.

Dr. Martha May Eliot

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 31, 1948

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following article that appeared in the Boston Sunday Post dated October 24, 1948:

AUNT MARTHA'S CAPITAL'S BEST "GOLD DIGGER"—OFFICIAL TITLE, DR. ELIOT, SHE GAINS NATION-WIDE RELIEF FOR 108,000 CRIPPLED CHILDREN AS ASSISTANT BUREAU CHIEF

(By Sally Ellis)

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 23.—Whenever Congress sees a short, gray-haired woman in a plain, dark coat and a hat of the soup-pot variety coming around the corner, their hands automatically creep toward their pockets and they dig deep.

For Aunt Martha, as she is called around the Capitol, is a gold-digger. When she turns up with that look of pleading in her soft brown eyes and in that back-home voice tells them how badly the thousands of children in the United States need aid and care—they're just dead ducks.

In recognition of this unusual talent and more specifically because she launched and directed the herculean emergency maternity and infant care program during the last war, "Aunt Martha," who is really Dr. Martha M. Eliot, associate chief of the Children's Bureau, will be given one of the highest honors in medicine on November 11 when the presentation of the Lasker Award will be made in Boston.

MILLIONS OF BABIES

Because Dr. Eliot is better than Circe at putting the bee on the boys with a fast line of chatter and a lure all her own, more than 1,500,000 servicemen's wives had their babies, with Uncle Sam footing the bills, during World War II.

Plump and motherly, her straight gray hair parted in the center and pulled back in an old-fashioned bun, Dr. Eliot does not look like the woman golfer type who usually heads up a Government agency.

A quick glance at Dr. Eliot would convince anyone that she should be standing in a sunny Vermont kitchen in a crisp gingham apron happily stirring a kettle of preserves.

There is a flavor of the 4–H Club about her, and people always picture Aunt Martha taking a pan of golden corn muffins out of the oven. Nothing, however, could be further from the truth.

Dr. Eliot never goes near the stove if she can help it, and she is much too busy at 57 hopping planes all over the country, traveling through the most desolate of rural areas to check on the huge Children's Bureau program which has stretched its protecting arms into the most remote mountain-country settlements.

Government bigwigs have said of Dr. Eliot that she goes forth to battle for her thousands of children all over the Nation with two things in her hand—a big pair of shears to cut the red tape that exists in Washington and a tambourine.

INEVITABLY BEGGING

"I suppose," laughed Dr. Eliot, "that they'll have me tying a Salvation Army bonnet on before long. I do have to admit that I always arrive before Congress with the tambourine in my hand. I am inevitably begging."

Dr. Eliot's most colossal task of squeezing money out of the lads on the Hill came in 1944, when her "baby," which she always refers to as EMIC (emergency maternity and infant care program), came up before the Senate.

They gave her $200,000. It was like offering a crust to a man who hadn't eaten for 2 weeks. Dr. Eliot's New England thrift and stretch-a-penny skill started the ball rolling with that pittance.

Through the individual States she set up the skeleton of EMIC; then settling her hat on her head with a brisk pull, she marched down to the House Appropriations Committee, pleaded the plight of the serviceman's wife who was bearing his child while her husband was overseas fighting for his country so effectively that the Congressmen earmarked another $1,800,000 for EMIC without a word.

"I felt a great surge of triumph," Dr. Eliot admitted.

Most typical of "Aunt Martha's" battle with the budget is her paper-littered desk at the United States Children's Bureau. Dr. Eliot says she has no head for figures, but with Chief Katharine F. Lenroot she managed to extract $45,000,000 in 1945 for her EMIC program which was distributed throughout the States.

SERVICE-MINDED FAMILY

While all this campaigning for funds is conducted in a mild, lamb-like manner with Dr. Eliot's steel-rimmed glasses quivering ever so slightly when she nodded her head in earnestness there were many times when storm-warnings showed.

When the welfare of sick children or of expectant mothers was at stake, then Dr. Eliot became the cyclone, carefully controlled.

"I used to have temper tantrums when I saw a child," she twinkled. "Terrible ones! I have to be careful now or else—."

Undoubtedly Dr. Eliot inherited her concern for the welfare of helpless children from her distinguished father, Dr. Christopher R. Eliot, who was minister at the Bullfinch Place Church for many years.

"He was minister-at-large to the people of Boston, it seemed," Dr. Eliot remarked, "and we were all brought up in the tradition of service."

Dr. Martha's brother, Frederick M. Eliot, is president of the American Unitarian Association in Boston, and her sister, Dr. Abigail Eliot of the Nursery Training School of Boston, is one of the foremost authorities in the country on the education of preschool children.

Brought up on West Cedar Street on Beacon Hill, Dr. Eliot attended Radcliffe College, received her medical training at Johns Hopkins University, and served as house officer at the Peter Bent Brigham Hospital.

It was after her residency at St. Louis Children's Hospital, however, that she first began seriously to consider going into pediatrics.

Mulling the matter over with one of her closest friends, Dr. Alice Hamilton, she remarked, "Dr. Henry Christian asked me why I didn't go into the children's field."

"Well, why don't you?" Dr. Hamilton replied.

AT YALE UNIVERSITY

Young Dr. Eliot proved so promising and carried out Dr. Christian's bright prediction so ably that Dr. Edward A. Park, whom she met at Johns Hopkins and who was newly appointed chief of the pediatrics service at the New Haven Hospital, invited her to come there as chief resident.

"It was taxing," Dr. Eliot agreed, "but there was always a way out of our problems and after all, nothing would be any fun if it wasn't hard!"

While Dr. Eliot was on the staff of the pediatric department of Yale University School of Medicine she did extensive research on the prevention of rickets and authorized many papers on their control and prevention and child nutrition.

If you were to try to discover what makes Dr. Martha tick, what accounts for her amazing administrative ability it would boil down to one thing—she has a cause.

Her association with the United States Children's Bureau began in 1924. In 1941 she became associate chief and today, 7 years later, she is still completely wrapped up in getting the best in the way of medical care for mothers and infants throughout the country.

"In 14 years we have gone far," she acknowledged, "but we're making our way. There is still a great deal of work to be done on the raising of standards of care.

"The actual medical care of sick children is not yet good. The amount available to children and mothers in many parts of the country is extremely limited. There is a shortage of personnel, of clinics and facilities. Doctors do a great deal—but not enough.

"I hope that eventually the Federal grants under the Social Security Act will be increased until the States can develop facilities."

The Children's Bureau, which Dr. Eliot heads with Dr. Lenroot, works out standards of care and protection for children. It has authored the best seller "Infant Care," which went into some 1,420,000 homes last year and which has taught many an anxious mother how to prepare formula, bathe the baby, recognize childhood diseases.

Special consultation is given State agencies on services for crippled children, including orthopedic nursing, medical-social procedures, occupational and physical therapy, and surgery.

"Crippled children's clinics penetrate to sparsely settled areas, of the country," Dr. Eliot explained, "and any child in need of aid can be brought to them.

"Approximately 108,000 crippled children received medical care in 1946, for example, under State plans approved by the Children's Bureau. Most of these were treated for crippling conditions resulting from infantile paralysis, congenital defects, birth injuries, accidents, rickets, osteomyelitis, bone and joint tuberculosis, and rheumatic fever, or heart disease."

What gets Dr. Martha down—but only momentarily—is when she receives reports that 40,000 children were given hospital care—but then learns that 20,000 more are on the waiting list.

That's when tambourine in one hand, big shears in the other, she turns up at Congress and the boys grin, "Here's Dr. Martha again—wonder what it's going to cost us now?"

Whenever anyone attempts to congratulate Dr. Eliot on her incredible accomplishments at the Bureau, a slow flush will creep over her face and she will protest ardently "I don't do it."

"It's the doctors, nurses, the social workers, statisticians, and accountants who work as a team that are responsible for the effectiveness of the program."

JOINT LEADERSHIP

The joint leadership of Dr. Eliot and Dr. Lenroot, however, is what makes Children's Bureau operations so powerful. When a service covers as much territory as this one with a total staff of only 71 people for the whole country, it takes expert piloting to keep the ship running on course.

Handicapped by limited salaries for their doctors and nurses, the Bureau, through ferreting out the very best in medical talent throughout the Nation, still manages to have a top-notch staff.

Part of this is due to Dr. Martha's excellent contacts in hospitals and universities all over the United States.

"We know who the best people are," Dr. Eliot smiled, "and although our salaries are on the shoestring level we appeal to their spirit of service and their interest in the welfare of our little children.

"If they are interested only in fame and material things, they don't come here," she added with emphasis. "We're sort of choosy here, and we don't take on anyone who doesn't want to work."

Youngsters in Dr. Eliot's bureau who put in a grueling day often wonder at eight in the evening how their associate chief manages to look like a newly picked rosebud. The answer, in her own words, is stamina. "I got it from my forebears," she grins.

In her career with the Children's Bureau she has chalked up thousands of miles of travel, turning up at a dedication of a remote rural hospital in the Kentucky mountain area with as much decor as she would if it were taking place at Rockefeller Foundation.

A GREAT TRIBUTE

As special technical consultant to the International Children's Emergency Fund of the United Nations in 1947, she visited a number of European countries to study the needs and make recommendations to the fund in planning its relief and rehabilitation program. The year 1935 found her in Geneva at the child welfare committee of the League of Nations' advisory commission for the protection and welfare of children and young people, and in 1936 she headed a group of experts there for a study of nutrition in infants and adolescents. In 1948 she was in Geneva again working with the First World Health Assembly.

With Dr. Ethel Dunham, a retired pediatrician, Dr. Eliot lives in a white colonial house in Georgetown. Twice a year she comes to Boston—to shop. She buys her spring and summer, fall and winter wardrobe at that famous Tremont Street store that all proper Bostonians patronize, cleans up the whole thing in an afternoon and is on her way to Washington.

There are three things Dr. Eliot is extraordinarily proud of. The first, of course, is the success of EMIC, the second, the Bureau's progress, and the third, the fact that she is the first woman president the American Public Health Association ever had.

"That," Dr. Eliot said modestly, "was a great tribute."

The Eighty-first Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE H. BENDER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 31, 1948

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, as a Member of the last five Congresses of the United States, now unhappily retired from this record of continuous service, I extend a word of greeting to the Eighty-first Congress. There will be many new faces in this assemblage. There will be many new and difficult tasks for this Congress to meet. There will be temptation to proceed rapidly to undo much that has been done.

It is my prayer for the new year that the men and women of the Eighty-first will carry out their responsibilities with devotion to our Nation. I wish them well. Our country and its obligations are already greater than they have ever been before in our history. They will grow still greater with the passage of time. May the Eighty-first Congress possess the wisdom, the foresight, and the good fortune which our people require today. All of us who are sincere in our Americanism wish them these attributes for our own sake and for the sake of Americans yet unborn.

Tribute to Mr. William A. Jump, Budget Officer for the Department of Agriculture

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EVERETT M. DIRKSEN
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 31, 1948

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, on December 23 the Secretary of Agriculture, Charles F. Brannan, announced that he had reluctantly accepted the request of William A. Jump, budget director of the Department of Agriculture for retirement.

In the many years that I served on the Subcommittee on Appropriations for the Department of Agriculture I came into intimate contact with Mr. Jump and had opportunity to appraise the man and his work.

I entertain a deep and abiding affection for Mr. Jump because of those qualities of loyalty, forthrightness, devotion to country and duty, and a Christian character which made him one of God's real noblemen. I am sure that every member of the subcommittee entertain this same affection for him and felt so genuinely enriched by his friendship.

I have often stated, publicly and privately, that I regarded Mr. Jump as one of the great administrators and budget officers in the Federal Government who had such a thorough knowledge of his work. He labored so patiently with all the painstaking details which were a part of his duty and by his thoroughness and capacity he made the task for members of the Appropriations Committee infinitely easier. I was often astonished by his grasp of details and with what clarity he could so often resolve what seemed like insurmountable technical difficulties. This capacity was the result of an amazing diligence and thoroughgoing devotion to his job. It is an almost irreplaceable loss.

For 41 years he served the people of the United States in the same department and gave his best under 11 Secretaries of Agriculture. He began as a message boy at $360 a year and in the space of more than twoscore years of service developed a national reputation for his knowledge in the field of Government administration.

There have been occasions over the years as he appeared before the Appropriations Committee that we were so profoundly impressed with his work and were deeply appreciative of the forthright and able way in which he made his budget presentations that the committee was unanimous in its conviction that his salary should be raised as a modest token of that appreciation.

He is so eminently deserving of a respite from highly confining public labors but the people of the United States and the Department of Agriculture will lose a great public servant who gave so unreservedly to the public welfare. The Congress lost an unselfish public servant whose perspective accomplished so much in establishing and maintaining a cordial and understanding relationship between the Congress and the Department of Agriculture.

Statement of Paul O. Peters

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM H. STEVENSON
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 31, 1948

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, Paul O. Peters came to the House Committee for the Aid of Small Business from the General Accounting Office, where he served as senior investigator in the Office of Investigation. A former newspaperman, he worked on the new assignment with energy and skill. During the year he made several investigations and submitted staff reports on the fuel-oil situation in the East and West North Central States; on alleged Government competition with business by the Navy Department at Kodiak Island, Alaska; and on the fertilizer program of the Tennessee Valley Authority.

During the year he appeared before numerous groups always speaking in behalf of American small business and the American way of life. As an example of his fine work, I submit for the RECORD his statements made before the Office of Industry Cooperation when voluntary programs were under consideration for the allocation of steel, under authority of Public Law 395, for the armed services, the program for the construction and repair of barges, and the program for the steel requirements of the anthracite-coal industry.

The statements of Mr. Peters follow:

STATEMENT OF PAUL O. PETERS, STAFF INVESTIGATOR, SELECT COMMITTEE ON SMALL BUSINESS, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, AUGUST 3, 1948

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, gentlemen and representatives of the armed forces, I have been greatly interested in this meeting this morning, because the Select Committee on Small Business of the House of Representatives in the past 6 months has received, not dozens, but hundreds of requests from small-business men throughout the Nation, in an endeavor to get steel to keep their plants running and fill their orders.

Now, gentlemen, I do not know whether or not the steel industry wants a voluntary plan, but I can assure you that we had better have some kind of plan or the next Congress will take some kind of action to assure that both the armed services get the steel they need and small business not be crowded out of the picture.

I noticed that our exports of steel last year were more than 6,500,000 tons. The gentleman on my right here says that the steel has "got to come out of somewhere." I suggest that the steel required by American small business come out of these export allocations.

I had one of my assistants get the export figures for the year 1947, and I was amazed that when I ran adding-machine totals on these figures that she compiled for me, we were exporting steel at alarming rates to countries in Europe that have normally been steel exporters.

For example, the Swedish steel industry, which was greatly expanded during the war, received 286,560 tons of steel and steel-mill products from the United States in 1947.

What is Sweden doing with all of that steel? That is the question. Is she trading with our potential enemies or is she rolling it into sheets, and so forth, and shipping it back here to sell in the free port of New York and other places?

Now, Belgium and Luxemburg, which have a pretty good steel capacity, got 61,796 tons of steel in 1947. And Great Britain got 195,311 tons of our steel, some of which is coming back here in Ford cars and things of that kind.

Are we more interested in building up dollars abroad than we are in maintaining American industry and American small business?

If these people in the Office of International Trade and the Department of Commerce think the American people are going to swallow any such program as that, they had better revise their thinking. This proposed voluntary plan would be totally unnecessary if the President would give to the Secretary of National Defense the authority he can give to him under subsection (h) of section 18 of the Selective Service Act of 1948.

Now, gentlemen, this thing is in your hands. Small business has not come around today to complain. They will not complain to you in the Department of Commerce; they will complain to the Senate Small Business Committee and to the House Small Business Committee, and they will read the Journal of Commerce and the Wall Street Journal, and they will see these offers of gray-market steel from $140 a ton to $300 a ton, and they will wonder where it is coming from, and they are going to demand some action from their Representatives in Congress next year, and they are going to demand a revision in the thinking of the Office of International Trade in the Department of Commerce. I tell you these things now.

Do not bait an elephant trap to catch a mouse, because some of the baiters may get caught themselves.

I do not think, and I think I can speak with confidence for our committee, that the Congress would look favorably upon section 8 of your proposed voluntary plan. It was not the intent of the Congress, nor the intent of our chairman, the Honorable WALTER C. PLOESER, of Missouri, that small business would be required to give up their normal trade in order to participate in a minor or a major Government contract. I hope you gentlemen will confer with the members of the steel industry, and in justice to the American people and in justice to small business and in justice to yourselves, strike out section 8 from this plan. As long as section 8 is in this plan, it is no plan at all for America.

STATEMENT OF PAUL O. PETERS, STAFF INVESTIGATOR, SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE SMALL BUSINESS, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, AUGUST 5, 1948

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Clark and gentlemen of the conference, the eminent gentleman from the Department of the Interior, Mr. Ball, has put the situation in a very fair light. He has stated that the proposed program is clear and it is workable, and that it is also in good hands.

I might add that in my opinion, the program is also necessary.

During the spring of 1948, I was sent out into the East and West North Central States to examine into the situation that was arising there with respect to the shortages in the petroleum supply. I had numerous consultations with persons in the petroleum industry, and I found that part of the shortage, at least, could be attributed to the lack of transportation facilities, including barges.

The amount of steel required for this program seems very, very modest to me. I made some calculations this morning, and I find that our export quota of the type of products required for this program averaged 136,600 tons per month. So this requirement of the barge people and the two boat people amounts to only 14.6 percent of our export quota monthly.

So again, speaking up for the little fellow, who is going to handle this oil this winter, and speaking up for the people who may be caught short, I am not going to argue, as Mr. Ball does, and differentiate between scarcity and shortages. When you haven't got any oil in the tank in the basement, it is not a scarcity, and it is not a shortage; it is a calamity.

So speaking for those little fellows, who are the ultimate consumers of the petroleum products and other things that we move around by barge, I hope that the Office of Industry Cooperation will not only concur with the steel men with respect to the proposed voluntary program, but I hope they will also confer with the gentlemen in the Office of International Trade who set up those export quotas for steel and keep some of this steel here at home to take care of our own economy first.

I might say that steel is very, very scarce and very, very short. We lost 1,600,000 tons due to the difficulties in the coal mines this spring, and the steel producers of this country have not yet attained capacity as a result of that sit-down on the part of the miners, especially in the captive mines. I want to say that the Small Business Committee of the House of Representatives is watching the voluntary programs and we think—at least, I do—that this is one of the best ones that we could engage in at the present time, and I want to compliment the men who got the program up.

STATEMENT OF PAUL O. PETERS, STAFF INVESTIGATOR, HOUSE SELECT COMMITTEE ON SMALL BUSINESS, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, AUGUST 6, 1948

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, Senator MYERS, and gentlemen, our interest in this program stems from the situation which arose last winter in which there were shortages in petroleum fuels and in anthracite coal in various sections of the North Central States and the New England States, as well as the Middle Atlantic States.

As has been pointed out, 5,000,000 American homes are heated by anthracite. If they do not have a good supply of anthracite coal available this winter and next winter, and for many years to come, there will be an increase in the tendency to shift to oil fuels, which are growing shorter and shorter every year in our country.

The House Small Business Committee is also interested in the problems which will arise for the 5,000 small dealers who handle this coal and who supply the 5,000,000 ultimate consumers.

These men cannot shift their business from day to day and from month to month. This program appears to be not only necessary but an urgent program.

It has been excellently planned. And if there is any doubt about whether or not we can have the steel available for the anthracite coal industry, let me point out to you gentlemen this fact: that the total amount of steel that the industry required every month is only 2.2 percent of our regular monthly export quotas of similar kinds of steel-mill products.

To be more specific, I will point out in the first 3 months of this year our export quota on plates, the type the anthracite industry needs, was 115,238 tons, an average of 38,746 tons a month, and the coal industry is only asking for a measly 550 tons.

If we can't squeeze it out anywhere else we had better squeeze it out of these export quotas.

And so likewise for sheet and strip. The 3-month quota was 77,905 tons, an average of 25,978 tons a month.

We surely won't deny the anthracite industry 750 tons a month.

Pipe; we are exporting pipe at the rate of 8,333 tons a month, the specific pipe that the anthracite industry needs. And they are only asking for 410 tons a month.

And now rails, and remember this, gentlemen, that the anthracite-coal industry isn't asking for any new rails. They will buy 60 pounds or heavier, relaying rails, second-hand rails, that the big trunk lines are tearing up from their side lines and substituting heavier steel.

And they are only asking for 860 tons a month. But we have been exporting an average of 42,651 tons of relaying rails every month.

Gentlemen, I congratulate you, too. I think it was wonderful of Senator MYERS to come up here and stand up for a program of this kind which I consider absolutely necessary for the anthracite consumers and for the anthracite dealers.

Hon. Everett M. Dirksen

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LESLIE C. ARENDS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 31, 1948

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein an editorial which appeared in the Champaign-Urbana News-Gazette of November 22, 1948:

DIRKSEN IS ONE REPUBLICAN WHO'S STILL CHAMP

In their search for new leadership Illinois Republicans cannot afford to overlook Congressman EVERETT M. DIRKSEN, of Pekin.

Congressman DIRKSEN is a "lame duck" along with a lot of other Republicans, but he is retiring by his own decision, not by vote of his constituents. When ill health prevented him from seeking renomination last spring there was sincere talk of drafting him for reelection even though he might not be able to attend all congressional sessions. Democratic as well as Republican colleagues in Congress encouraged this idea, because they recognized him as one of the most able members of either party.

DIRKSEN rejected reelection, but has since staged a physical come-back that surprised even himself. At age 52 he is leaving Congress after 16 years of outstanding service. In the Eightieth Congress he was "mayor of Washington" by virtue of his chairmanship of the Committee on the District of Columbia. He guided farm legislation as chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations for the Department of Agriculture. He distinguished himself with a liberal and aggressive outlook in foreign affairs, but his popularity won him the jealousy of some of the GOP powers then riding high.

There is good reason to believe—and hope—that Illinois Republicans have not heard the last of this Congressman. He was first elected in an industrial and agricultural district in 1932 when Roosevelt first swept the GOP out of office. He is retiring still champion without the stigma of defeat. Since spring he has proved the doctors were wrong, and he is raring to go again in either government or private law practice.

DIRKSEN reportedly may decide to seek the Republican senatorial nomination in 1950 and oppose Democratic Senator SCOTT LUCAS. Most Republicans are ready now to concede that this will be a tough assignment, but his past record indicates DIRKSEN may be just the man who can do it.

Some Illinois Republicans, particularly Gov. Dwight H. Green, have attempted in the past to impede DIRKSEN's rise in State party circles. But, with their patronage power gone, they will be in a poor position to retard him as in the past, jealous though they may be.

DIRKSEN is still on his way up while many of the Old Guard who sniped at him are on their way out.

Grade A Disloyalty

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERBERT C. BONNER
OF NORTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 31, 1948

Mr. BONNER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Raleigh News and Observer of December 30, 1948:

GRADE A DISLOYALTY

On Monday at Kansas City President Truman made a statement that "certain leaders" in the Soviet government "are exceedingly anxious to have an understanding with us."

That was the President's statement. He has declined to amplify it. Foreign diplomats and independent American citizens have a perfect right to question the correctness of the President's statement. But so far as the President's own governmental staff is concerned that is the statement of this Government. The President is by constitutional authority and mandate of the people the maker and leader of our foreign policy.

Yet from Washington and obviously from the State Department comes the statement that President Truman "was expressing a personal view" and that "he spoke out at Kansas City without consulting in advance his advisers on relations with the Soviet Union." The Associated Press story continued: "His top Russian advisers doubt however, that there is any real split in the Kremlin on the basic, long-term attitude of Soviet Russia toward the United States." And further: "The Kansas City episode is the latest in a series of instances in which the White House and the State Department have appeared to work at cross-purposes."

It is certainly the latest in a series of incidents in which some State Department functionaries, in complete misunderstanding of their position, have by whispers to newspapermen and other devices, undertaken to undercut the foreign policy statements of the President of the United States. He is not the captive of his advisers. They are exactly what those words mean, his advisers, and nothing more. He can take their advice or discard it; he can ask for it or follow his own judgment. Within the executive branch of the Government it is their duty only to carry out the policy set by the President, and not by whisper and leak to newspapermen to explain Presidential policy away.

This sort of thing went on in scandalous disloyalty to the President during the election campaign. The explanation, if not the excuse, then was that the State Department boys had been reading Dr. Gallup and thought that they no longer needed to bother much with Harry Truman. It is high time, however, that the State Department boys who pretend to be experts on the political affairs of every other government in the world realized something about the political and governmental structure of their own Government. Apparently they learn nothing, and with Truman in Kansas City and Marshall sick in North Carolina, they are still ready to explain away as improper and irrelevant a statement made by the President without advice and authority from them.

This is not only disloyalty to the President, it is also disloyalty to America in a delicate and difficult field in which the President within the executive branch has the sole and inescapable responsibility and authority. Foreign governments have a right to believe as Americans also believe that when the President has spoken American policy has been laid down. He must, of course, in this field work with the Congress and particularly with the Senate. That means foreign policy by government and not foreign policy by clerk—no matter how pompous, self-opinionated, or self-confident those clerks, called advisers, may have become.

The Late Edgar A. Sharp

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER A. LYNCH
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 31, 1948

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Speaker, on November 27, 1948, New York lost, through death, one of its very distinguished citizens in the person of Hon. Edgar A. Sharp, who represented the First New York Congressional District in the Seventy-ninth Congress. Long before either of us came to Congress, we had been close friends, to whom the difference of party affiliation was no hindrance.

Representative Sharp was one of those kindly persons whom you liked when you first met him, and with whom acquaintance rapidly ripened into lasting friendship.

The Advance, a newspaper in his home town of Patchogue, Long Island, N. Y., in its issue of December 2, 1948, paid our former colleague the following tribute:

EDGAR A. SHARP—AN ERA IS PASSING

More than a tinge of sadness swept through Suffolk County, and particularly Patchogue, last Saturday morning when announcement was made of the death of Hon. Edgar A. Sharp. His passing was another climax that marks almost the end of an era here—an era that a few survivors look back upon in fond retrospect.

Ed Sharp, as he was known from boyhood, was a vibrant, articulate exponent of an almost forgotten cycle of living that brings nostalgic memories to those who remember cinder paths and bicycle races, horseback riding, and amateur theatricals, evening calls on neighbors, and parties where guests were called upon to display their talents. And few there were as versatile as Ed. Possessed of a cheerful disposition, bearing malice toward none, generous of personal time and purse, he was loved by many and liked by all. Without attempting to capitalize on his popularity, Ed Sharp probably had one of the largest unorganized personal followings of any man Patchogue has ever known.

His versatility was known and respected far and wide; he was until a very few years ago an excellent singer, and he could, when asked, sit down at the piano and play and sing almost any old-time or popular song requested. He was an excellent dancer and an actor of no mean ability. As he grew older the younger generation came to know him and to appreciate his accomplishments, and he was a great favorite with them.

He and his good wife were among the most hospitable people in the village, and not many years ago, when a small group of young girls were wont to go about singing carols on Christmas Eve, it was their pleasure to end up at the Sharp residence, where they remained until nearly midnight. Each year Ed and Sadie looked forward to the coming of the happy group who immediately made themselves at home and beseeched their host to play the piano and sing for them. Deeply touched that the young folks enjoyed his company, Ed, who never talked down to them, but, having that enviable ability of sensing continual change and progress in youth, talked with them understandingly in their own language. When cider, cake, and other refreshments had been passed and the youngsters were lounging on davenport and floor, Ed would turn to the piano and, in his fine, melodious voice, entertain the group for a solid 2 hours. Interspersing his singing with jokes and with his natural ability to keep up a running fire of anecdotes and wise-cracking, the time passed all too quickly for guests and hosts alike, and fond farewells were said with a pressing invitation and sincere assurances of acceptance for a repeat visit the following year.

From a humble beginning as a railway mail clerk, Mr. Sharp achieved material success, slowly at first but at an accelerated rate of speed at the beginning of World War I, when he resigned his modest position in the Patchogue postoffice and joined the Knights of Columbus war work. Following a short training period at home, he was sent overseas to France where he suddenly developed great executive ability. Later he was transferred to England where he was given one promotion after another, and at the conclusion of the war he was in supreme charge of all of the Knights of Columbus hospitals, canteens, executive offices, and other activities throughout all of Europe. "Ed" Sharp had now "found" himself, and upon his return home he engaged in the real-estate and insurance business, and shortly thereafter he was elected to the board of directors of the Citizens Trust Co. and then to the board of trustees of the Union Savings Bank. He was now regarded by conservative businessmen as an important factor in the life of this community.

Mr. Sharp was in demand as a speaker at various functions and was soon sought after politically, as he had always been a stanch Republican. He served as county committeeman and supervisor of Brookhaven town, and when the new judicial district embracing a part of Nassau and all of Suffolk County was created, he was endorsed by Chairman W. KINGSLAND MACY, of the Suffolk County Republican Committee, for the office of Representative, and he was elected the first Congressman from this district. Ill health prevented him from continuing his political duties, and he later retired from this arduous, exacting work. The end of his career was spent here at home, quietly and unobtrusively.

The measure of Edgar A. Sharp's success can be attributed, we believe, to a few simple, homely rules: he liked people; he was a good citizen and a good husband; he did for others without demanding anything in return; he was an optimist, never a pessimist. Handsome, urbane, natty in dress, as straight in carriage as an Indian, the figure and personality of Ed Sharp has been carved deeply in the etching of Patchogue's history. We shall miss him, but he will long be remembered here as a kindly, gracious, leading citizen of our community.

Tomorrow Is Our Day of Conscience

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. HERMAN P. EBERHARTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 31, 1948

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Gen. Omar N. Bradley, Chief of Staff, United States Army, before the Armistice Day luncheon, Boston Chamber of Commerce, Boston, Mass., Wednesday, November 10, 1948:

Tomorrow is our day of conscience.

For although it is a monument to victory, it is also a symbol of failure. Just as it honors the dead, so must it humble the living.

Armistice Day is a constant reminder that we won a war and lost a peace.

It is both a tribute and an indictment: A tribute to the men who died that their neighbors might live without fear of aggression. An indictment of those who lived and forfeited their chance for peace.

Therefore, while Armistice Day is a day for pride, it is for pride in the achievements of others—humility in our own.

Neither remorse nor logic can hide the fact that our armistice ended in failure. Not until the armistice myth exploded in the blast of a Stuka bomb did we learn that the winning of wars does not in itself make peace. And not until Pearl Harbor did we learn that noninvolvement in peace means certain involvement in war.

We paid grievously for those faults of the past in deaths, disaster, and dollars.

It was a penalty we knowingly chose to risk. We made the choice when we defaulted on our task in creating and safeguarding a peace.

Now new weapons have made the risk of war a suicidal hazard. Any nation which does not exert its vigor, wealth, and armed strength in the avoidance of conflict before it strikes, shall endanger its survival. It is no longer possible to shield ourselves with arms alone against the ordeal of attack. For modern war visits destruction on the victor and the vanquished alike. Our only complete assurance of surviving world war III is to halt it before it starts.

For that reason we clearly have no choice but to face the challenge of these strained times. To ignore the danger of aggression is simply to invite it. It must never again be said of the American people: Once more we won a war; once more we lost a peace. If we do, we shall doom our children to a struggle that will take their lives.

Armed forces can wage wars but they cannot make peace. For there is a wide chasm between war and peace—a chasm that can only be bridged by good will, discussion, compromise, and agreement. In 1945 while still bleeding from the wounds of aggression, the nations of this world met in San Francisco to build that span from war to peace. For 3 years—first hopefully, then guardedly, now fearfully—free nations have labored to complete that bridge. Yet again and again they have been obstructed by a nation whose ambitions thrive best on tension, whose leaders are scornful of peace except on their own impossible terms.

The unity with which we started that structure has been riddled by fear and suspicion. In place of agreement we are wrangling dangerously over the body of that very nation whose aggression had caused us to seek each other as allies and friends.

Only 3 years after our soldiers first clasped hands over the Elbe, this great wartime ally has spurned friendship with recrimination, it has clenched its fists and skulked in conspiracy behind its secretive borders.

As a result today we are neither at peace nor war. Instead we are engaged in this contest of tension, seeking agreement with those who disdain it, rearming, and struggling for peace.

Time can be for or against us.

It can be for us if diligence in our search for agreement equals the vigilance with which we prepare for a storm.

It can be against us if disillusionment weakens our faith in discussion—or if our vigilance corrodes while we wait.

Disillusionment is always the enemy of peace. And today—as after World War I—disillusionment can come from expecting too much, too easily, too soon. In our impatience we must never forget that fundamental differences have divided this world; they allow no swift, no cheap, no easy solutions.

While as a prudent people we must prepare ourselves to encounter what we may be unable to prevent, we nevertheless must never surrender ourselves to the certainty of that encounter.

For if we say there is no good in arguing with what must inevitably come, then we shall be left with no choice but to create a garrison state and empty our wealth into arms. The burden of long-term total preparedness for some indefinite but inevitable war could not help but crush the freedom we prize. It would leave the American people soft victims for bloodless aggression.

Both the east and the west today deprecate war. Yet because of its threatening gestures, its espousal of chaos, its secretive tactics, and its habits of force—one nation has caused the rest of the world to fear that it might recklessly resort to force rather than be blocked in its greater ambitions.

The American people have said both in their aid to Greece and in the reconstruction of Europe that any threat to freedom is a threat to our own lives. For we know that unless free peoples stand boldly and united against the forces of aggression, they may fall wretchedly, one by one, into the web of oppression.

It is fear of the brutal unprincipled use of force by reckless nations that might ignore the vast reserves of our defensive strength that has caused the American people to enlarge their air, naval, and ground arms.

Reluctant as we are to muster this costly strength, we must leave no chance for miscalculation in the mind of any aggressor.

Because in the United States it is the people who are sovereign, the Government is theirs to speak their voice and to voice their will, truthfully and without distortion.

We, the American people, can stand cleanly before the entire world and say plainly to any state:

"This Government will not assail you.

"You can have no conflict without being yourselves the aggressor."

Since the origin of the American people, their chief trait has been the hatred of war. And yet these American people are ready to take up their arms against aggression and destroy if need be by their might any nation which would violate the peace of the world.

There can be no compromise with aggression anywhere in the world. For aggression multiplies—in rapid succession—disregard for the rights of man. Freedom when threatened anywhere is at once threatened everywhere.

No more convincing an avowal of their peaceful intentions could have been made by the American people than by their offer to submit to United Nations the secret of the atom bomb. Our willingness to surrender this trump advantage that atomic energy might be used for the peaceful welfare of mankind splintered the lies of those word-warmakers that our atom had been teamed with the dollar for imperialistic gain.

Yet because we asked adequate guaranties and freedom of world-wide inspection by the community of nations itself, our offer was declined and the atom has been recruited into this present contest of nerves. To those people who contend that secrecy and medieval sovereignty are more precious than a system of atomic control, I can only reply that it is a cheap price to pay for peace.

The atom bomb is far more than a military weapon. It may—as Bernard Baruch once said—contain the choice between the quick and the dead. We dare not forget that the advantage in atomic warfare lies with aggression and surprise. If we become engaged in an atom bomb race, we may simply lull ourselves to sleep behind an atomic stockpile. The way to win an atomic war is to make certain it never starts.

With the monstrous weapons man already has, humanity is in danger of being trapped in this world by its moral adolescents. Our knowledge of science has clearly outstripped our capacity to control it. We have too many men of science; too few men of God. We have grasped the mystery of the atom and rejected the Sermon on the Mount. Man is stumbling blindly through a spiritual darkness while toying with the precarious secrets of life and death. The world has achieved brilliance without wisdom, power without conscience. Ours is a world of nuclear giants and ethical infants. We know more about war than we know about peace, more about killing than we know about living.

This is our twentieth century's claim to distinction and to progress.

In our concentration on the tactics of strength and resourcefulness which have been used in the contest for blockaded Berlin, we must not forget that we are also engaged in a long-range conflict of ideas. Democracy can withstand ideological attacks if democracy will provide earnestly and liberally for the welfare of its people. To defend democracy against attack, men must value freedom. And to value freedom they must benefit by it in happier and more secure lives for their wives and their children.

Throughout this period of tension in which we live, the American people must demonstrate conclusively to all other peoples of the world that democracy not only guarantees man's human freedom but that it guarantees his economic dignity and progress as well. To practice freedom and make it work, we must cherish the individual, we must provide him the opportunities for reward and impress upon him the responsibilities a freeman bears to the society in which he lives.

The American people cannot abdicate in this present struggle and leave the problem to their armed forces.

For this is not a test of combat strength but a contest of resolution. It is dependent less upon military strength and more upon human strength, faith, and fortitude among such citizens as you. If we are to combat communism, we cannot oppose with anti-communism. We cannot fight something with nothing. More than ever before, we must alert our people—and people throughout the world—to the meaning of their freedom and stimulate in each of them an awareness of their own, their personal share in this struggle.

Good citizenship is the start of a working democracy. And good citizenship begins at home, in the ability of every American to provide a happy and wholesome life for his family. From such simple beginnings do we create better communities, better States, a better Nation—and eventually, we hope, a better world.

To you in the greater community of New England much has been given in the heritage that began with Concord, and in the truths that have been left for you by your Lowells, your Emersons, your Holmeses.

Out of so fortunate a spiritual start in the meaning and significance of freedom, you have constructed an industrial machine with which to nourish great faith in it.

If we will only believe in democracy, use it, and practice its precepts in the factory as well as the voting booth, we shall so strengthen ourselves that nothing can prevail against us—or against those who stand with us in like good faith.

The Gulf Intracoastal Waterway: Past, Present, and Future

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN E. LYLE

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 31, 1948

Mr. LYLE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Dale Miller, executive vice president, Intracoastal Canal Association of Louisiana and Texas, at the annual convention of the Propeller Club of the United States and the American Merchant Marine Conference, Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, New York City, October 13, 1948:

I acknowledge some temerity in accepting this assignment on the program, being aware of the omniscience of my audience on the subject of water transportation. But the circumstance that my remarks are to be confined to the Gulf Intracoastal Waterway gives me some confidence to address you, because with that particular topic I feel at home, in a rather literal construction of the term. We have been products of the same environment, and I have moved within the orbit of its destiny since I was a child in the small community of Corpus Christi, where the principal vessels in those years, except for a few shrimping boats, were the canoes which we youngsters fashioned from barrel staves and canvas.

It would perhaps be ungallant to refer to the Gulf Coast in the early years of this century as a wilderness, because certainly its inhabitants were as restlessly enterprising as Texans were before and have been since. But it is nevertheless true that when the Intracoastal Canal Association was formed in the little community of Victoria on August 8, 1905, much of the vast coastal region in Louisiana and Texas was not far removed from the primitive. For miles along the farflung coast of Texas little could be seen but sage and cedar and mesquite, and life consisted principally of rattlesnakes and jackrabbits and occasional paisanos, with accents of civilization supplied here and there by vaqueros and scattered herds of longhorns. There were occasional communities, to be sure, but what they were by comparison with what they are today can be illustrated by the fact that Houston had less than one-tenth of the population that it has today, and my own little town of Corpus Christi had less than one-twentieth. The 18 Texas counties contiguous to the present course of the Intracoastal Canal from the Sabine River to the Rio Grande, a distance of some 500 miles, had a total population of only 250,000, about one-seventh of their total population today; and the Louisiana parishes were likewise steeped in an economic languor which was scarcely prophetic of the phenomenal growth to come.

Indeed, only the audacious optimism which characterizes the frontier could have inspired the document which originated from the little cow town of Victoria in 1905. "A representative convention" was called, "agreeable to the desires of a great many public-spirited citizens * * * for the purpose of discussing the feasibility, plans, and final construction of an intercoastal canal from Brownsville, Tex., to Donaldsonville, La., and for the especial purpose of organizing an intercoastal canal league." Terming this proposed canal "a necessary adjunct to the rapid development of the greatest country in the world," this clarion call declared: "This canal will give all the section of country adjacent to same the advantage of direct communication by water with all our deep water ports, and in addition thereto will extend the same advantages to the tributaries of the canal (in Texas) * * * and all the rivers and bayous in Louisiana, and also the great Mississippi River and all its tributaries, which spread over the country like a great hand laid over the face of the United States."

These were extravagant words, but the oratory at the convention itself was more grandiose still. The Victoria meeting was studded with the names of distinguished delegates, one of whom, the young Congressman for that district, was somewhat eclipsed by the more celebrated visitors; but former Vice President John N. Garner is today one of the three survivors of that original meeting.

Despite the oratory, it is doubtful if those pioneers could have envisaged much more than a local canal to accommodate small fishing fleets and pleasure craft; but they were as persistent as they were visionary, and as the years went by, the program of the Interstate Inland Waterway League of Louisiana and Texas (as the Intracoastal Canal Association was first called) began to assume impressive proportions. The initial goal was a 5 feet by 40 feet project, a canal 5 feet in depth and 40 feet in width; and before many years had passed, a project of those dimensions had been completed from the Mississippi to the Sabine River on the Texas boundary; and another project of like dimensions from the Houston-Galveston district to Corpus Christi. This left a gap between the Sabine and Galveston Bay, and while each link provided facilities for local traffic, no through transportation was possible.

During those early years the leaders of our association had difficulty in persuading Government officials to appraise the project from the broad perspective of its relationship to the inland waterway system of the United States. The Government insisted that each link be considered separately on its rather circumscribed merits, while the association contended that the canal should be considered in its entirety as an extension and integral part of the Nation's developing system of navigable waterways. The years of the First World War intervened, but shortly thereafter, in order to place its position as forcefully as possible before Congress, the association employed as consulting engineer the late Gen. George W. Goethals to make an exhaustive report on the traffic potentialities of the intracoastal canal. His impressive document was largely responsible for the authorization by Congress, in the River and Harbor Acts of 1925 and 1927, of a canal with a depth of 9 feet and a bottom width of 100 feet from the Mississippi River near New Orleans to Corpus Christi, Tex.

It is interesting to note that when General Goethals recommended the construction of the canal he estimated its normal potential tonnage at approximately 5,000,000 tons, and predicted that it might reach a maximum of 10,000,000 tons if and when the Mississippi River system was completed. Today, only a quarter of a century since his survey was made, the Texas and Louisiana sections of the Gulf Intracoastal Waterway are carrying more than 20,000,000 tons of commerce a year, four times as great as his estimate of the normal potential and twice the amount of the maximum he predicted.

The metamorphosis which has been wrought in the Gulf coast country of Texas and Louisiana in recent years defies description. Little of the past remains in that vigorous and productive region to evoke nostalgic reminiscence of those early years. Massive oil refineries, chemical factories, lumber mills, cotton compresses and cotton oil mills, meat-packing plants, shipyards and drydocks, rice mills, sulfur plants, grain elevators, synthetic rubber plants, oil and steel fabrication shops, sugar mills, canning plants, and many other industries too numerous to mention have risen from the sage and chaparral to create what is today America's most astonishing industrial frontier. Spires of steel and stone, symbols of progress, rise from the coastal plains; derricks shoot up from the cotton fields, standing like colossi athwart the lethargy of the past. A great new empire is in the making.

What has happened, of course, has been the result of the union between the beneficence of nature and the ingenuity of man. Rich natural resources are being converted to useful implements of the human society. But there, as anywhere else, the motivating force of civilization is transportation, without which the interchange of goods and services which constitutes civilization would not be possible. To a degree not often paralleled in other sections of the Nation and the world, water transportation in particular has influenced the transition of the Gulf coast country from a sprawling frontier to a bustling industrial and agricultural commonwealth. Major ports exist in New Orleans and Lake Charles, in Beaumont, Port Arthur, Galveston, Houston, Corpus Christi, and Brownsville; and through them all, coursing its busy way and concerting their economic growth, extends the Intracoastal Canal, like a shining strand linking together those jewels of progress into a fabulous necklace along the curving bosom of the Gulf.

Although the Gulf Intracoastal Waterway has proved to be an extremely valuable artery of commerce even in depression and peacetime years, its greatest contribution to the welfare of the Nation was achieved during the recent war. While scores of tankers and freighters were being lost to enemy action not only along the Atlantic coast but in the Gulf of Mexico itself, millions of tons of petroleum, sulfur, and other vital war materials were moving in safety in a protected inland waterway, virtually within sight of the catastrophes at sea. With ocean shipping constantly in peril, and with railroad rolling stock in dangerous short supply, the Intracoastal Canal and the inland waterway system of the Nation generally made a contribution to the national welfare of incalculable value. It is not too extreme to say that the service performed by our inland waterway system was indispensable to the successful prosecution of the war.

The war was scarcely 6 months old when Congress passed the Mansfield bill which authorized increasing the depth of the Intracoastal Canal to 12 feet and its bottom width to 125 feet, and extending it beyond Corpus Christi to the Rio Grande. This work went forward during and after the war, and the civil-functions bill which passed Congress on June 14 of this year contained an appropriation of $2,119,000 for the dredging of the last remaining gap in the main channel between Corpus Christi and Brownsville. Thus, within the next few months, the main channel of the Gulf Intracoastal Waterway, extending all the way from the west coast of Florida to the Mexican border, will have been completed—a protected inland waterway of more than a thousand miles.

When we reflect upon the vast importance of our inland waterway system in time of war, we should have reason to doubt, as war clouds gather and darken over the earth again, if we place sufficient emphasis before our Representatives in Congress on the necessity of developing and perfecting this great system. It is a significant fact that Federal funds now being expended on all phases of river and harbor navigation constitute only a small fraction of 1 percent of our total annual budget. With our Federal Government spending more than $110,000,000 a day for all purposes, the amount being expended this year for river and harbor work amounts to the spending which would take place in only a day and a half.

Our expenditures for national defense alone, not including commitments under the Marshall Plan and other international expenditures which are related to defense, are nearly 100 times greater than the amount being spent for all phases of river and harbor development in the United States. Expenditures for all essential purposes of Government, and particularly those for the defense of our Nation, are not to be begrudged, of course, but, in my opinion, the vital importance of our inland waterway system to the security of our country in time of war should be emphasized as strongly as its contribution to our national economy in time of peace.

The completion during the next few months of the main channel of the Gulf intracoastal waterway to the Rio Grande will open up the fabulous magic valley of Texas to barge transportation. Hundreds of thousands of tons of commerce will be added almost instantly to the tremendous tonnage already carried on the Intracoastal Canal. Funds will be sought in the appropriations bill next year to complete the second terminus of the canal east of Harlingen. When this work is finished a great objective pursued by our association over a period of more than 40 years will have been reached.

Simultaneously with the effort to reach this important objective the energies of our association are now being directed toward a vast future program which is no less inspiring and challenging than that which motivated the aspirations of the little band of pioneers who met together in Victoria so many years ago. We propose to develop for navigation the principal streams tributary to the canal in Louisiana and Texas, thus extending the benefits of water transportation into the rich hinterlands of these great States. Many of these streams have already been authorized for navigation by Congress, and others are in various stages of engineering study. Just as the early proponents of this waterway persisted in viewing the proposed canal not as an isolated and provincial facility but as an integral part of the inland waterway system of the Nation, so do we regard the completed main channel as a framework upon which to build a greater transportation system in the future. At the annual convention of our association in New Orleans last November, Brig. Gen. P. A. Feringa, assistant chief of engineers for civil works, put this objective into these succinct and eloquent words:

"This waterway without such feeders is but a skeleton. The feeders place meat on its bones. With completion of the feeders proportionately greater benefit can be rendered by the through waterway channel already completed. As the channels are extended inland, new trade territories are opened to direct water transportation, unexploited natural resources are tapped, additional agricultural lands are placed in production, new industries arise and are placed within economic reach of each other for the adjustment of local surpluses and scarcities. Ours is an expanding economy, and this expansion is unquestionably stimulated by waterway development. You have only to look at some of your coastal cities and their tributary areas to realize how inspiringly true that statement is."

We propose to continue our efforts to bring to fruition that slogan and objective of our organization: "From Maine to Mexico." Only the construction of the authorized barge canal across northern Florida, and extension of the Atlantic inland waterway from Trenton, N. J., to New York Harbor, remain to be accomplished to provide a protected inland waterway from Maine to Mexico, a distance of nearly 3,000 miles. The construction of the cross-Florida barge canal has been too long deferred and should be completed with the least possible delay. The Atlantic inland waterway extending from the east coast of Florida to Trenton, N. J., a distance of more than 1,000 miles, is almost identical in length with the Gulf Intracoastal Waterway extending from the west coast of Florida to the Mexican border. The barge canal across northern Florida is all that is needed to link these great transportation facilities together.

The absence of that link during the last war was extremely costly in loss of vessels, in loss of vital cargoes, and in loss of human life. Fifty-three tankers and freighters were lost to enemy action in the Atlantic and the Gulf of Mexico. The estimated value of these vessels alone, not including the value of their precious cargoes, was $87,000,000. The strategic value of the ships and cargoes cannot be measured, nor can the value of the lives that were lost. How much of this tonnage could have been diverted to a safe inland waterway if the cross-Florida link had been in existence, I am not prepared to say, but I have no doubt that it would have been substantial. In any event, the security of our Nation in time of war, as well as the economic benefits to be derived in time of peace, should dictate the construction of this needed half-way link between two great systems within the near future.

Another important objective of our association in the years ahead—one which is fascinating indeed to contemplate—is the extension of the Intracoastal Canal beyond the Rio Grande and down the Mexican coast to Tampico and Vera Cruz. This is a project which has long been discussed. In fact, the Mexican Government had an official observer at the first meeting of our association in Victoria in 1905. The coastal terrain of Mexico, so similar to that of Texas, is conducive to the construction of an inland waterway, and certainly the economic benefits to be derived by both nations from such an important transportation facility would be considerable. We propose to cooperate in every possible way with our friends and neighbors to the South in the hope that the Government of Mexico may undertake this highly important program.

Those of us who guide as best we can the activities of our association have much for which to be grateful in the examples set for us by the great progenitors of this work. It is difficult for us to be objective and impersonal toward this movement, for since its earliest beginnings it has never been merely a project or a program. It has been a Cause with a capital C. Indeed, it has evinced many of the characteristics of a crusade. C. S. E. Holland, Roy Miller, J. S. Cullinan, Congressman J. J. Mansfield, Senator John H. Overton, and others who have departed this life bequeathed a heritage of devotion to the public service which is the lodestar now of our own tomorrows.

Address of National Commander S. Perry Brown, of the American Legion, in Favor of Federal Aid to Education

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD G. ROHRBOUGH
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 31, 1948

Mr. ROHRBOUGH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an address delivered by the national commander of the American Legion, S. Perry Brown.

In this he presents what, it seems to me, are most convincing arguments in favor of Federal aid to education.

The address follows:

For 28 years it has been the privilege and pleasure of the American Legion to cooperate with the National Education Association in the annual sponsorship of American Education Week. Our joint purpose has been to acquaint the general public with the aims, needs, and achievements of our schools, and to stimulate popular interest in the Nation's educational system. The theme chosen for this year is Strengthening the Foundations of Peace.

Like other American institutions, our educational system is the product of long years of labor and sacrifice in the cause of freedom. Within the lifetime of the boys and girls now attending school, that cause may well be identified as a permanent success or a noble failure. We must see to it that education is enabled to wield its full force on the decisions at hand.

There are two primary challenges before us. One is to equip coming generations with the zeal and tools to make democracy work. The other is to see that our schools have the financial assistance to provide equal educational opportunities for all.

It is a sad commentary that it requires almost an international crisis to rouse public appreciation of our system of government. For years, Americans passively accepted their democratic heritage without fully comprehending its advantages. Then the Communists intruded, claiming their system would cure the ills of the world and improve the lot of all mankind.

The absurdity of the Communist claim is clear. We know that our democratic system has worked better than any other on earth. Not only has it yielded a great harvest of material blessings but—more important—it has provided real incentive for the free development of mind and spirit.

So why not emphasize the fundamentals of Americanism in our classrooms? Why not stress there our duties and responsibilities of citizenship, as well as privileges and rights? This is what I mean by cultivating a zeal for democracy.

We believe it is the responsibility of the schools to instruct our youth in the American way of life, so that they may know it, believe in it, and preserve it. We believe our schools should give thorough attention to the creed and operation of all other government systems as well.

We—The American Legion and the National Education Association—solicit your support of this program.

The need for prompt action to equalize our educational standards at the highest possible level is no less urgent.

Consider the fact that some 650,000 men were rejected for service in World War II because they could not read and write. This is the equivalent of 40 divisions with supporting troops.

I cite the record in this matter only to point up the dangerously wide range in the ability of various States to finance educational programs. One State, by expending 2 percent of its peoples' income can provide $230 for each child in school. Another State, by using 2 percent of its income, can yield only $53 per child in school. The poorer districts simply cannot afford the broad curricula and superior facilities on which sound education is predicated.

There is an old saying that crime does not pay. There is no analogy between the pursuit of crime and pursuit of a teaching profession, but circumstances have placed the two occupations in about the same category, in terms of revenue. Thousands of teachers are struggling along on salaries far out of step with the spiraling cost of living.

The American Legion stands four-square behind proposed legislation to extend Federal financial support for our schools.

It is our studied opinion that the school districts of the Nation should support themselves insofar as they are able to do so, but that impoverished districts, wherever located, should have additional aid in the form of Federal grants. Aid should be conveyed without Federal domination of, or interference with, the control of the schools by local authorities.

To each one of you, I commend this thought. The men and women who will be called upon to speak for America in meeting the crises of tomorrow are the boys and girls attending our schools today. We will be directly accountable should we fail to assure the maintenance of educational processes which would enable them to cope with their future responsibilities.

Winning the peace is the one big job at which all of us must work. It stands to reason that the better the understanding of problems involved, the better the chance for final success. Let us resolve, today, to give of our personal energies and effort to make certain the schools of the Nation shall contribute full share to this undertaking.

The Late George F. Rogers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER A. LYNCH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 31, 1948

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Speaker, in the interim between the adjournment of the Eightieth Congress and today, New York lost one of its distinguished citizens in the death of your former colleague, George F. Rogers, of Rochester.

Those who served with him in the Seventy-ninth Congress well remember him for his quiet manner, his unfailing sense of humor and his sound judgment.

George Rogers, who so ably represented the New York Fortieth Congressional, was born in Harwood, Ontario, Canada, on March 19, 1887, but for almost 40 years prior to his death on November 20, last, had been a food merchant in the city of Rochester, N. Y., was elected for a 2-year term to the New York State Senate in 1936, and was responsible for legislation that was of great benefit to dairy farmers in his State. He had previously served for 3 years as a supervisor of Monroe County.

In his death the city of Rochester and the State of New York lost an outstanding citizen. It can well be said of him that he was truly an American.

Republicanism Versus Communism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD F. YOUNGBLOOD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 31, 1948

Mr. YOUNGBLOOD. Mr. Speaker, we are met today in what will be the last session of the Eightieth Congress of the United States of America. For the past 2 years we have had a great part in guiding the destinies of our beloved country. In a very few days our work shall be ended. I, for one, have been proud to have been a part of this practical example of the workings of our form of government.

Now that our days are numbered, I feel compelled to say that our works can only be judged by history. However, I think it right and proper to prophesy what history shall judge of the Congress which shall supplant us and of what history shall judge of the administration which will conduct the executive affairs of our Nation during the coming few years.

It was made clear, I thought, during the late strenuous campaign that the issues involved were not of parties, nor of men, but rather, the issue was one of Republicanism versus communism. There was, I said and still say, no middle road. If this is true, and I am convinced it is, we have put the reins of government into the hands of the fellow travelers, the Communist-lovers, and the enemies of freedom. Our Nation is now in the hands of the pink, the left-winger, and the red. There can be no other path through which such an administration can travel than that leading through the mire of red tape, the woods of bureaucracies and the thorny path of more governmental control, more taxation, and more spend and spend and spend until we at last reach the end of this gloomy road in the house of communism. Once there, we must expect to be embraced by our host with blood purging, regimentation, and his stripping us of every vestige of our freedom. This is not a warning. I did my warning prior to November of this year. This is a prophesy, terrible but inescapable. It is difficult to stand by and see this happen. It is equally difficult to understand why it is happening. Are we so negligent in our efforts to preserve freedom? No, I think not. Is it because the public does not understand what is happening? I pray not, but I fear it is true.

I prophesy that the bunglings of the New Deal will continue to vex our people. Let me cite for example the Berlin situation. Here we are, the people of the United States, using our great air fleet to feed, clothe, and warm the people of Berlin while Russia calmly but inexorably forbids our use of easier and cheaper modes of delivery. We must take to the air. Why? Merely because we have assumed a share in the management of conquered countries without assuring ourselves of a means of doing it. We have bought our responsibilities, like a farmer buys his land, without obtaining a road over which we can travel to reach our house. What colossal stupidity. What costly errors. How long, O Lord, how long can we travel this path?

We must some day soon reach our day of reckoning, this is my forecast. Our astronomical national debt will someday tumble upon us, plunging us into revolution, ruin, and depression, and bankruptcy and despair. I can sit at my hotel table and eat for many, many hours but sooner or later the check must be paid. One day in the foreseeable future the bill for our Government's appetite will be brought to us and the feasting of 16 years will have to be reckoned with.

The investigations of the Eightieth Congress disclosed definitely and unequivocally that the executive department of our Government, has trafficked with Communists in the past. Can we assume that it will not continue to do so in the future? I think not. Any logical person will assume, I am sure, that this traffic will continue. Let us remember that Alger Hiss was high in the echelon of government. Roosevelt, when he was President, relied upon him heavily. His successor, Harry S. Truman, likewise counseled with him. Perhaps, it is not stupidity but Hiss who is responsible for the calamities of Potsdam, Yalta, and Tehran.

It does not seem possible to me that we could find ourselves in the present ominous situation without the intervention of subversive minds. I would sooner believe that there are malevolent forces boring from within than that our ship of state is in such incompetent hands that we have drifted into shoal water through ignorance. We can, once alerted to the dangers, cauterize the festering wounds of foreign isms, but crass stupidity is not so easy to combat.

In addition, I want to call your attention to the fact that the cost of food is now showing a steady decline without the reinstitution of price controls or any action whatsoever on the part of the present administration. The Eightieth Congress is deserving of all credit for the reduction in the high cost of living, and the President and his policies is the direct cause of its retention.

Let us Republicans, let us Americans take up the fight again. I for one do not intend to lay down my arms. Let me call upon you to carry on the fight so that some day, some time we can return our Government to faithful, competent, and loyal hands and still forever the threat of encroaching communism.

As you will all recall, Mr. Truman labeled the Eightieth Congress the "do-nothing Congress" and as usual he was wrong, although he led the people to believe that he was correct. It is my opinion, as well as the opinion of all thinking Americans, that Mr. Truman was a do-nothing President.

Latin Intervention

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 31, 1948

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I believe that those who are interested in our foreign policy as carried out by our State Department will be interested in the remarks of one of our ablest diplomats, Mr. Sumner Welles.

In order that it may become a matter of public record, I ask unanimous consent to insert an article entitled "Latin Intervention," written by Mr. Sumner Welles. The article appeared in the Washington Post on Tuesday, December 28, 1948.

LATIN INTERVENTION

(By Sumner Welles)

TREND FROM GOOD NEIGHBORLINESS

(Editor's Note: The following column was written before Mr. Welles' unfortunate accident on Sunday.)

The political and social unrest spreading through Latin America is gathering momentum.

Inflation, commercial stagnation, and arrested industrialization, all aggravated by dollar shortages, have created an increasingly serious economic crisis. In many republics labor, agriculture, and the white-collar workers have been hard hit. The Communist leaders are taking full advantage of the opportunity to further hemispheric disruption.

The dangers that would arise unless this Government undertook remedial action have long since been forecast in this column.

The abandonment of the good-neighbor policy evidenced by our official interference in Argentina's national elections, and by our failure either to continue financial and economic cooperation or to coordinate the European recovery program with an inter-American program designed to relieve the postwar difficulties of the other American republics, has undermined popular faith in our dependability. It has fostered the growth of ideological blocs in Latin America whose rivalries jeopardize the maintenance of even a semblance of New World unity.

Public opinion here too often confuses the cause with the effect.

A typical instance is to be found in an editorial in the New York Times of December 16. Remarking on the growing number of military dictatorships, the editorial asks, "Are not the people of an American State entitled to expect from democratic neighbors some protection against such arbitrary seizures of power?"

Three years ago the New York Times was a leading advocate of the policy of official interference in Argentina which stimulated ultranationalism and aroused anti-United States sentiment in that Republic, and to which General Peron owed his majority in the presidential elections. The present trend toward military dictatorship in the Americas is in no small part due to the precedent created by the success of the military in winning popular support in Argentina as an outgrowth of the national reaction against United States pressure.

Although our interventionist policies have proved disastrous, we are now asked to believe that the remedy for the evils brought about by these policies will be a larger dose of the same medicine.

Ignoring the demonstrated sterility of nonrecognition as compared with the benefits arising from the friendly counsel that can be offered by other American governments if official channels remain open, the editorial inveighs against the Estrada doctrine which was adopted by the Organization of American States at Bogotá last spring. It calls it "a somewhat cynical dogma that encourages election by revolution."

What are the facts? The Estrada doctrine was conceived as a safeguard against our own practice in former years of withholding recognition from a de facto government as a leverage to secure political or economic concessions. The doctrine eliminates the opportunity for the exercise of such pressure by providing for a continuity of relations even if a new government comes to power through force. But it also envisages the severance of diplomatic relations should the other American governments, individually or collectively, decide that the policies of that government endanger the welfare of the new hemisphere.

From the time when President Wilson sought to promote democracy in Latin America through nonrecognition of revolutionary governments, our interference in the political concerns of other American peoples has invariably bred inter-American dissension and hostility against us, and has weakened, rather than strengthened, the national forces that make for democracy.

It is not surprising that a responsible Latin-American newspaper should already have asserted that the New York Times is demanding that the United States should frankly dictate the kind of governments Latin America should have, with Washington taking charge of the classification of those that are good and of those that are bad governments.

The New York Times concludes with the dictum, "If we believe democracy is good for us, then we must believe that it would be good for others, too."

It is precisely this assumption of national omniscience in deciding what is best for other peoples which has led in the past to such tragic anomalies as the occupation of the Dominican Republic by the United States Marines, the death at our hands of Dominican patriots, the replacement of a Dominican Government composed of United States naval officers, and the loss by the Dominican people of all individual liberty.

What warrant have we for assuming that a form of democracy which has been gradually evolved to meet the needs of the English-speaking peoples must therefore be equally responsive to the needs of peoples of a wholly different origin, tradition, and culture?

If we now seek to restrict the right of the Latin-American peoples to support or to overthrow their own governments we will destroy the regional system of the New World.

The American Republics should certainly agree upon effective measures to safeguard the essential human freedoms throughout the hemisphere.

But both the State Department and the New York Times would do far more to discourage revolutions and military dictatorships in the Americas by procuring a return to those earlier and proven policies of economic and financial cooperation which can raise living standards, increase communications, and improve education, nutrition, and sanitation, than by calling for the imposition on the peoples of Latin America of our own standards of constitutional government.

Neither democracy nor inter-American unity will be advanced by an attempt to set up a supra-sovereign power in the Americas through which the United States would have, and would certainly be suspected of having, a determining influence in the internal political life of the other American states.

The Mighty Columbia River

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALT HORAN
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 31, 1948

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I would like to insert the following editorial from the Wenatchee Daily World, Wenatchee, Wash. It is a very interesting discussion of the values to the Nation in the great Columbia River.

MEANS FOR OIL CONSERVATION

One of the major problems facing the world today is the future supply of oil. Even the United States, which has owed so much of its great industrial growth and high standard of living to an abundance of low-priced oil products, is now facing a situation justifying serious concern.

Oil resources are the key to diplomacy in the Middle East. Oil is needed for our huge Navy and Air Force, say nothing about our industries and for home heating requirements. In the United States oil production and consumption have run more than 60 percent of the entire world total. Its prewar (1938) per capita consumption was more than 10 times that of western Europe and about 90 times that of Asia. United States consumption has increased 75 percent since 1938.

Oilmen are facing a winter with wary optimism. They are in short supply of kerosene and the full demand is not known. The industry lacks storage space for reserves and they just managed to get by summer without gas rationing, but another cold winter might cause them great concern. Crude petroleum is selling at $2.65 a barrel, more than twice the wartime price.

The industry is faced with shortages, necessity for conservation, and new construction essential to increase their supply. The situation may well get worse before improvement is noted.

A very interesting and informative study has just been completed by Charles E. Cone, research expert for the Columbia Basin Commission on the subject of oil, coal, and hydroelectric equivalents. The study is apropos to the acute shortage of oil and how hydroelectric power is so much cheaper for production of power and heating.

The study reveals it would require 93,750,000 barrels of oil (42 gallons to the barrel) to produce the power potential of the main stem of the Columbia, 36,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours per year, or enough electricity to serve the entire Nation for 6 or 7 weeks at current rate of use. In the same respect it would take 23,500,000 tons of coal to produce the same power potential. Both oil and coal are resources, once used, can never be replaced. Water can be used over and over again for production of power. Each successive reservoir dam constructed on the Columbia increases the production of firm power.

The Federal Power Commission reports that United States is burning annually 7,000,000 tons of coal, 4,500,000 barrels of oil, and 45,000,000,000 feet of natural gas—just to generate electricity. This is confirmation of the major role that development of more cheap hydroelectric power can play in the conservation of our natural resources such as oil, coal, and gas.

Congressman WALT HORAN has repeatedly urged in congressional hearings the expansion of our Columbia River hydroelectric power as a means of conserving our valuable oil resources. He has rightly emphasized this expansion of hydroelectric power is not in competition with the oil industry but rather assists them in conserving their dwindling supply for the Government and areas where hydroelectric power is not available. This was one of the major reasons Congressman HORAN used in urging immediate action on construction of Foster Creek Dam. In the light of this study by Charles Cone and Federal Power Commission studies, it is a valid and sound argument.

Did We Buy Socialism With Truman?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. BYRNES
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 31, 1948

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial from the Saturday Evening Post entitled "Did We Buy Socialism With Truman?" dated December 4, 1948:

DID WE BUY SOCIALISM WITH TRUMAN?

After all that has been said in felicitation of President Truman and his gallant fight against overwhelming odds, one has to face up to what this election may mean to the future of the United States. The people didn't hate Harry Truman enough to defeat him or love Governor Dewey enough to elect him. But after all, a contest for the office of President is not a golf match and all this talk of closing ranks and showing superior sportsmanship can hardly dispose of the fact that, unless Mr. Truman's campaign promises were so much guff, the country may be in for a rough ride.

If the President had stood on the record of his public acts, the prospects would not be bad. He has been right on a lot of things, among them aid to Greece and western Europe, defense, and control of atomic energy. But these things, for which Governor Dewey also stood, were not what elected President Truman. He owes his election pretty much to the fact that some millions of people have come to accept the philosophy of the heroine of Gentlemen Prefer Blondes: to wit, that love and affection are very nice, but a diamond ring lasts a lifetime. The sterling American farmer reasoned that Dewey might be wonderful, but it was Truman who was paying the support prices. Other groups were persuaded by promises that Uncle Sam would build them a house, pay their doctors' bills, or guarantee hamburgers at 30 cents a pound. It all comes to the same thing.

President Truman is, of course, entitled to the hearty support of all citizens in his genuine efforts to promote peace and keep America free and prosperous. However, whenever the implementation of his campaign promises tempts him and his followers into measures involving a planned economy or some sort of benevolent national socialism, then the duty of such conservatives as remain in Congress becomes more complicated. In extreme circumstances it may become what it was during the first New Deal: to fight a rear-guard action to preserve as much of our free economy as possible. This blocking and tackling is a thankless and unprofitable job, but if all politicians had shirked it in the frenzied years from 1932 to 1940, the damage from the New Deal would have been more disastrous than it was.

There will be men in the new Congress, even in the President's own party, who will exert a conservative influence. It is hard to imagine SAM RAYBURN, who will be Speaker of the House, breaking his neck to help pass a too drastic civil-rights program, or Senator GEORGE, of Georgia, who will go back as chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, supporting an inflationary program. Such stalwarts seem less conspicuous in the House than in the Senate, but the run-of-mine, middle-of-the-road Democrats plus a good share of the Republicans ought to be able to erode the more bizarre items down to size. Repeal of the Taft-Hartley law may prove difficult too. The measure may be doctored up and repassed as the Thomas-Lesinski bill, but Congress is sure to debate some time before repealing the law which President Truman himself used to end the coal strike, particularly since the large industrial States voted for Dewey. With prices leveling off, the Truman demand for price control will find opposition, too. Nevertheless, the President can fairly claim a mandate for the measures he stood for in his campaign. A fair share of them will land on the statute books.

President Truman, while he may not have understood all the implications of his multitudinous promises, intends them to be carried out. Many of them sounded like irresponsible enticements by a man who realized that it was impossible to overestimate the number of crackpots on the voting lists. But Kansas City-type politics do not altogether explain Mr. Truman's campaign. Anyway, President Truman cannot now retreat from his program, the result of his decision to ignore the conservatives in his party and play for the lefties. Politically, this proved sound strategy, but it will cause a lot of headaches. The President is hooked with zealots like Senator-elect HUMPHREY, of Minneapolis, who wants to push so-called civil rights down the throat of the South. The CIO will expect prompt repeal of the Taft-Hartley law. Other pressure groups will remind Mr. Truman of his promises of price control, rent control, housing and health programs. And he'll have to go along, even if, like the Little Old Lady in the nursery rhyme, he wakes up some morning to the bewildered realization that "this is none of I."

We might as well not kid ourselves. Mr. Truman's program, as pieced together from his campaign pledges and speeches, contains the seeds of planning and a regimented economy. Call it a police state if you want to, because this is the way police states begin. The unending largess adds to the already back-breaking load on the Government credit. The consequent acceleration of inflation brings a new clamor for price control, with all the ubiquitous snoopers and spies needed to make it appear that there is compliance. When the producer, compelled to meet all wage demands, but forbidden to raise his prices, makes a squawk, he is first persecuted as an obstructionist and then forced to stand aside while functionaries of the state manage his business for him. Higher taxation discourages investment and dries up the supply of capital, so that the one remaining source for the succor of industry becomes the state. Finally, the worker, the supposed beneficiary of the intended utopia, is reminded that things are going to pot because he—quite naturally—isn't producing enough. This would be where we came in, except that, normal incentives being frowned on as Fascist, direction of labor by the state takes its place. Take it away, Sir Stafford Legree.

Too gloomy? We hope so, but it seems reasonable to expect that the country will get at least some of what it voted for. If there are people so naive as to imagine that the Truman program could be carried out under a free economy, they are in for a rude awakening. And if there are even more naive people who believe you can have a state-controlled economy without regimentation and loss of freedom, their awakening will be ruder. Of course, the voters didn't consciously vote for national socialism, but that makes little difference. The world's most prominent dictatorships started from small beginnings—social reformers giving the customers what they wanted without the least idea that they were sapping the structure of human freedom. Ironically the most tyrannical dictatorship in history began its career by informing the suckers: "You have nothing to lose but your chains."

Such hope as remains of escaping this dreary routine lies in the historic distaste of Americans for change which goes too far. If repeated defeats for old-style liberalism have not convinced the conservatives in Congress that they are facing a "wave of the future" which there is no use fighting any longer, they may take the inevitable abuse certain to be heaped on anyone who tries to check the drive toward regimentation. But the disagreeable truth is that the American people have given the green light to the planners and the big-government boys. Everywhere else in the world such people have needed but one lease on power to push their countries over the cliff. If we in America have better luck, we can hardly be said to deserve it.

Top Secret Documents Known to Reds Often Before United States Officials Saw Them

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 31, 1948

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am inserting an article by Constantine Brown which appeared in the Evening Star on December 7, 1948. The article is entitled "Top Secret Documents Known to Reds Often Before United States Officials Saw Them."

THIS CHANGING WORLD—TOP SECRET DOCUMENTS KNOWN TO REDS OFTEN BEFORE UNITED STATES OFFICIALS SAW THEM

(By Constantine Brown)

The seventh anniversary of Pearl Harbor will be marked in unique fashion in Washington.

The House Committee on Un-American Activities is expected after an executive meeting today, to provide the American people with some sensational revelations of espionage inside the State, War, and Navy Departments over a 10-year period, beginning in 1937 when Russian agents first started to get the inside track in those departments.

How much of the real story will be disclosed by the committee in its public hearings depends on whether the Justice Department and other responsible departments give the green light to the subcommittee headed by Senator-elect KARL MUNDT and to the retiring investigator, Robert E. Stripling.

REDS PREPARED LINES

Because of vital security considerations it is improbable that more than a few documents out of a stack 3 feet high will be brought into public view. But even the few offered for public observation will show how well the U. S. S. R. has prepared its lines and how it took advantage of misguided idealism, venality, and corruption to obtain the innermost secrets of this country's national defense.

Many in Washington knew about the inroads which Russian espionage and intrigue had made in this country. But they were in no position to do more than hint vaguely at what they knew, since they had no tangible proofs.

Hearsay, even when it comes from responsible officials, is not sufficient, since these officials were in danger of being "axed" if they had attempted to support their statements. Moreover, even those who were willing to risk their official necks realized that their sacrifice would do no good, since they would not be believed.

For instance, one very high official in the State Department objected in 1940—while Russia was still Germany's ally—to permitting the issuance of export licenses to the U. S. S. R. for certain materials which were to have military use. He put his objections in writing in a top-secret memorandum for the Secretary of State. Less than a week later he received a call from Constantin Oumansky, then Soviet Ambassador in Washington, asking him to come to the Embassy for a little talk.

KNEW ABOUT HIS VIEWS

Mr. Oumansky asked him why he fought Soviet-American friendship by opposing issuance of export licenses. Before the American official could recover from his surprise at learning that the Russians knew all about the views he had expressed in his memorandum, Mr. Oumansky declared:

"My friend, if you play along with us there is no telling how high you will go in the hierarchy of the Department. I would not be surprised if you were selected for the post of Ambassador to Moscow. That is, if you change your present attitude. But you won't get very far if you continue to oppose us."

Later when Maxim Litvinov replaced Mr. Oumansky after Pearl Harbor, the new Ambassador strongly insisted that unless this particular official were removed there could be no genuine American-Soviet cooperation. The official in question was saved from the ax by being transferred to a foreign post far from any Soviet influence.

There were many such incidents throughout the years preceding and during the war. They showed clearly how remarkably well informed the Soviet Government was on almost every phase of our life. Although our security services were strictly forbidden to attempt to break the Russian codes, there was sufficient information to convince our security officials that few of our top secret documents were not known to Moscow, sometimes before the highest-ranking American officials knew about them.

Meaning of America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALT HORAN
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 31, 1948

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I would like to include the following article from the person column of Mr. Fred C. Koch, editor and publisher of the East Wenatchee Journal, East Wenatchee, Wash.

Mr. Koch was born in Russia and at an early age he moved to the United States. During the war he served his Government in Germany and assisted in setting up the first publications among the newly liberated population. Mr. Koch has a keen understanding of the real values of America and what a privilege it is to live here.

I believe that you will enjoy reading this fundamental article.

A certain salesman for a well-known Wenatchee establishment went calling on his trade up and down Wenatchee Avenue the other morning.

On this particular morning, he caused an unusual stir among several of the people he was wont to contact on these daily tours.

He was wearing one of those new Dewey-Warren campaign buttons that have been blossoming out on coat lapels all over town the past few days.

One of the salesman's stirred-up friends took him quite severely to task because he, as a salesman calling on customers of every political walk of life, should be flaunting his political beliefs in his lapel buttonhole.

The salesman was no fool. He gave the needler a reply that put his criticism in its place. He said:

"Listen! You can be damned thankful I'm permitted to wear this button—and that you are permitted to wear any button you want to wear.

"That's one of the fine things about this country.

"In some countries, they would tell both you and me what kind of a button we can wear—and it would be one and the same button, whether you or I liked it or not."

The salesman's critic was satisfied.

Before any of us becomes critical of the political button his neighbor wears, or what political card he displays in his business, we should remember this little piece of pointed repartee and be very thankful there is more than one campaign button, and more than one face on campaign posters for President and for other offices in the country.

That's one of the essential parts of Americanism. When you criticize a man for wearing the colors of his party, you're criticizing him for being American.

In fact, when you begin to do that, you're beginning to show symptoms of the disease called totalitarianism.

The country needs two strong political parties. It also needs a third party like whatever shaggy Henry Wallace's calls itself. The country needs this third party to remind the other two that they must always keep their fences in order or they will disintegrate into heterogeneous bodies, none in itself an important or widely representative factor in the body politic.

It will be a sad day for America if and when its two major parties wane in strength and number, and if in their place half a dozen or more parties spring into existence, all stronger than our present minor parties.

Then, the predominant party will never represent the majority of the people, and the Government will be a Government by minority. It was just such a situation in Germany that permitted a minority group, the National Socialists, to seize power. The Nazis in 1932 were not representative of the majority of the German people, but the non-National Socialists were so split up among so many various and sundry parties, that they, the Nazis, became the strongest among the many.

In the days when the Republican Party meant high tariffs and the Democrats meant low tariffs, people could belong to either party without being hesitant to expose their affiliation in public. The public in general didn't know anything about tariffs and cared less. A good, honest Democrat then was considered as good an American as a Republican—and the other way around.

Then, in 1932, came the forgotten-man era. In the stress and strain of economic reverses that were world-wide in nature and a direct outgrowth of the First World War, political savants and shysters together exploited an economic disaster by making the party in power the goat in the eyes of the American people.

A forgotten man was concocted, and the Republican Party as a whole was blamed for an economic condition that grew out of a war fought under a Democratic administration. The long and short of the political chicanery was that for a time not too many years ago a Republican was made to appear as the next thing to a Fascist in the minds of a great many American people.

It is an unfortunate thing for the political welfare of the country when a Democrat is reluctant to wear a Truman button and a Republican fears to wear a Dewey button for fear of reprisal and boycott. This is the product of political intolerance—an intolerance created willfully by politicians of the murkiest water who seek to smash their way to power by employing prejudice, class hatred, and any device to discredit and malign the opposition.

There are millions of pretty doggone fine Americans in both major American political parties—but what the leaders of these parties will have to remember is this: America comes first—even above the party. Whenever the party resorts to forgotten-man tactics that breed class hatred, it weakens America more, and for a longer period, than it weakens the opposing party.

Anything that sets neighbor against neighbor over political differences is alien to the welfare of our country—and if there ever was a time when the people must be united, it is now. The American people can save the ideology of the western world from the ravages of communism, but only if they remain united as Americans regardless of political party affiliation.

I am a Republican, and I am not ashamed or afraid to wear a Dewey-Warren button—because I am an American.

If I were a Democrat, I would not be afraid or ashamed to wear a Truman-Barkley button—because I am an American.

The only insignia I would be ashamed to wear on Wenatchee Avenue or anywhere else would be the hammer and sickle—because I am an American.

Report of the Veterans of Foreign Wars Ladies Auxiliary Cancer Research Fund

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 31, 1948

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I wish to submit a report of the Veterans of Foreign Wars Ladies Auxiliary cancer research fund, sent to me by Mrs. Grace H. Davis, national secretary of the Veterans of Foreign Wars Ladies Auxiliary. This organization is to be commended upon the fine, generous work they are accomplishing in the so important fight for cancer control. The report follows:

REPORT OF NATIONAL CANCER RESEARCH CHAIRMAN

To the Officers and Members of the Ladies Auxiliary to the Veterans of Foreign Wars:

After my appointment as national chairman of the cancer research fellowship fund of the ladies auxiliary to the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the first objective was to find a place where we could best center our activities.

Letters were written Dr. Frank Adair and Dr. Charles Geschicter and I personally contacted Dr. Raymond McNeely and Mr. Harrison, vice president of the Chicago University. All these men are noted for their work in the field of cancer. They were very much interested in our project but suggestions made by them were such that we, as an organization, would not retain our identity.

About that time Past National President Anna Mae Shaw sent a clipping to the national secretary, Grace H. Davis, on the burning and total destruction of the Jackson Memorial Laboratory at Bar Harbor, Maine. In that tragic fire of the Maine woods one of the most important laboratories and the only one of its kind was lost to the world of science. When this clipping reached me I wrote at once to Dr. C. C. Little, director for information, on the possibility of our organization being of help in rebuilding the laboratory. The letter was mailed from Gallup, N. Mex., on November 26, and the morning of November 29, I received a telegram from Dr. Little saying that the trustees were very much interested and an air-mail special delivery letter would leave their office the following Monday, giving suggestions as to how the ladies auxiliary, VFW, might be of assistance to the laboratory.

At a conference with the national president, Dorothy Mann, and the national secretary, Grace H. Davis, in Denver early in December it was decided that the Roscoe B. Jackson Memorial Laboratory would receive the help of the ladies auxiliary in rebuilding the summer research laboratory and it would be known as the ladies auxiliary to the Veterans of Foreign Wars summer research laboratory.

Letters were sent each department president explaining the project and asking that a department chairman be appointed, who would in turn contact the auxiliary presidents asking that local chairmen be appointed. No quota was set but it was suggested that the goal be $1 per member, all donations to come from members. This was followed by letters giving information on the laboratory and on the subject of cancer. Approximately 500 letters were mailed to department chairmen. An article was published each month in the auxiliary bulletin.

It was my privilege to meet Dr. Little in New York City just prior to the patriotic conference in Washington, D. C. He showed and explained architect's drawing of the summer laboratory, explaining plans for new buildings. I was very happy to have Dr. Little accept an invitation to come to Washington a few days later and speak to the members attending the conference at a luncheon. I feel assured that all who heard Dr. Little were greatly inspired. Dr. Little commended very highly the program of the national president and said the ladies auxiliary, VFW, was the only organization of its kind to offer help.

At the request of the national president I attended meetings in Denver, Colo., Oklahoma City, and the midwinter conference in Indianapolis, Ind., speaking on the subject of cancer research and the ladies auxiliary summer research laboratory.

A report of moneys contributed is herewith attached. It is with great pleasure that I am able to report that while the total amount hoped for was not reached, we will be able to fulfill our promise and I am sure by the time of the national encampment the amount of $50,000 will be paid Dr. Little, director of the Roscoe B. Jackson Memorial Laboratory.

My personal thanks to the members who responded so generously in making this program a success. I have enjoyed working on the cancer research program and express my sincere thanks to our national president, Dorothy Mann, for the privilege of being national chairman of this outstanding program.

Respectfully submitted.

EVELYN B. MONACO.

Spy Ring Exposed

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN E. RANKIN

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 31, 1948

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am inserting the espionage report of the Committee on Un-American Activities together with certain documents, released to the press, which constitute a part of the report.

The Committee on Un-American Activities has uncovered one of the greatest spy rings in history, one that reached into the vitals of the State Department and probably other departments of the Government, and undoubtedly carried on its treasonable espionage throughout the war.

The information they got and passed out to foreign governments undoubtedly fell into the hands of Japan and contributed to the horrible disaster inflicted upon our Navy at Pearl Harbor, to say nothing of the men who lost their lives on the various battle fronts of the world, as a result of this treason during the succeeding war years.

I wish every patriotic American could read this document and these releases and understand their far-reaching implications.

Then they would appreciate what the members of this committee have gone through under the abuse of the enemies within our gates, their stooges, and fellow travelers during the last few years.

The report of the committee follows:

COMMUNIST ESPIONAGE WITHIN THE UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT

INTRODUCTION AND SUMMARY

Communist espionage has broken through the security forces of the United States Government and made off with secret information of both military and diplomatic character concerning our national plans, policies, and actions.

This espionage system has been carefully developed over a period of more than 25 years and it has been successful to a degree alarmingly critical to the welfare and safety of the people of this Republic.

Following are some details, drawn together from testimony taken by the House Committee on Un-American Activities in recent months, concerning the operations of just one such Communist apparatus set up in Washington, D. C., for the benefit of world communism.

This report should be read as a supplement to the committee report of August 28, 1948, which dealt with operations of that same Communist apparatus known up to that time. It should also be read with the thought in mind that many of the more intimate and extensive particulars of evidence sworn to by witnesses under oath are not here disclosed. The committee is withholding these for the time being because the Department of Justice and other agencies of the executive branch are undertaking to bring prosecutions against faithless Government servants and other Soviet agents on the basis of existing law.

The experiences of the committee in collecting the evidence on which this report is based have led us to recommend new legislation, particulars on which will be found in the closing chapter of this document.

BACKGROUND INFORMATION

Forty-eight hours after publication of the Russo-German pact of August 23, 1939, one Whittaker Chambers, a Communist agent, decided to abandon communism. He tried to see the President of the United States to expose the nature and details of the Communist conspiracy in this country.

He was unsuccessful, but finally did reach Assistant Secretary of State Adolf Berle and gave him an outline of his activity, on the basis of which Secretary Berle took notes from him for an hour and a half.

In 1941 Chambers furnished similar information to representatives of the Department of Justice, the effect of which was to indicate that he, Chambers, had been an important member of a Communist apparatus in Washington which was still at that time operating among officers of the United States Government holding positions in high public trust.

On August 3, 1948, the committee subpenaed Whittaker Chambers before it in connection with its investigation of Communist espionage within the Government. He then gave testimony concerning the operations of the Communist apparatus and information which he had sought to disclose to the executive branch of the Government in 1939.

After receiving Chambers' first sworn public testimony, our committee and its staff of eight investigators began a diligent investigation of his credibility and started exploring the many leads offered.

This procedure led finally to the public confrontation before our committee in Washington on August 25, 1948, of Whittaker Chambers and Alger Hiss, president of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, a former special assistant and director of the Office of Special Political Affairs, United States Department of State, and a former Secretary General of the San Francisco Conference for the drafting of the United Nations Charter.

As a result of the evidence obtained by our investigators, plus the testimony brought out in the public hearings of Hiss and Chambers, this committee issued an interim report on August 28, 1948, from which report the following quotations should be helpful in reviewing the present status of the current espionage investigation:

QUOTATIONS FROM COMMITTEE'S REPORT OF AUGUST 28

"Not until the House Committee on Un-American Activities began its current hearings on the subject did the general public have any knowledge that the now established and disclosed Communist espionage activities had reached into vital positions of high authority in Government. Not until these hearings began did the general public or even the average Member of Congress have the evidence upon which to base decisions concerning the new legislation essential to our national security under prevailing conditions. Not until these hearings began did the people to whom this Government belongs have any direct evidence as to the men and methods being employed to subjugate our freedom to the tyranny of a foreign totalitarian power. The false security of complacent ignorance is much worse than having either no security or no complacency at all.

* * * * *

"It was not until our public hearings had proceeded for some time that it was definitely established that Alger Hiss and Whittaker Chambers knew each other personally and rather intimately during the precise period of time that Whittaker Chambers testified that their associations took place. Mr. Hiss testified that he knew Whittaker Chambers by the name of George Crosley, but he positively identified the man known today as Whittaker Chambers as the man he knew. He testified unequivocally that he not only knew Chambers (by the name of Crosley) but that he let him use his apartment without ever receiving payment for it, that he loaned Chambers money, that he loaned or gave him an automobile, and that he had even kept Mr. and Mrs. Chambers and their baby in his own home overnight on one or more occasions. Thus the connection between Alger Hiss and Whittaker Chambers, as a man-to-man relationship, stands without challenge confirmed by the testimony of both men and the public hearings held by this committee. This fact had never been established by other investigations.

"It should also be noted that the stark fact that Alger Hiss and Whittaker Chambers, a self-confessed paid Communist functionary and espionage agent, were acquainted with each other, and did have numerous transactions and associations together, is of far greater significance under the circumstances than whether Chambers was known to Hiss by the name of 'Carl' or 'George Crosley.' This fact has been established without challenge for the record by the public hearings of this committee, although through the years it had been established by no other investigation.

"Hiss will be given every opportunity to reconcile the conflicting portions of his testimony, but the confrontation of the two men and the attendant testimony from both witnesses has definitely shifted the burden of proof from Chambers to Hiss, in the opinion of this committee. Up to now, the verifiable portions of Chambers' testimony have stood up strongly; the verifiable portions of the Hiss' testimony have been badly shaken and are primarily refuted by the testimony of Hiss versus Hiss, as the complete text of the printed hearings will reveal.

"As a result of the hearings and investigations which have been conducted by the committee to date, these facts have been clearly established: (1) There is no doubt whatever but that Chambers from 1931 to 1938 was a paid functionary of the Communist Party and that from 1934 to 1937 he operated as a member of the Communist underground among Government workers in Washington. (2) The refusal of Nathan Witt, John Abt, Henry Collins, Lee Pressman, and Victor Perlo, to answer any questions concerning their activities as members of this group on the ground of self-incrimination, and to answer as to whether or not they were members of the Communist Party during that period is in itself strong corroborative evidence for Chambers' story. (3) By his own admission Hiss knew Chambers for a period of at least 10 months during the period in question and possibly longer. It is also clear that Hiss knew Chambers very well as indicated by his admission that he sublet his furnished apartment to him, that he met him on various occasions for lunch, that on at least one occasion he gave him a ride to New York from Washington, that for several days the Chambers family visited in the Hiss home and that he loaned money to Chambers, and that he gave him an automobile. (4) While admitting that he knew Chambers, Hiss still denies that he knew that Chambers was a Communist, and that he, Hiss, was a member of the Communist Party at any time.

"Hiss testified on August 16 and 17 that at the time that he leased his apartment to Chambers he gave him a 1929 Ford automobile. In his testimony in the public session on August 25, however, when confronted with documentary evidence which committee investigators produced that he actually had transferred the car in 1936 to the Cherner Motor Co., who the same day transferred it to one William Rosen, Hiss changed his position on the car and testified in a manner which to the committee seemed vague and evasive. He stated that he could not recall whether or not he gave the car to Chambers or whether he loaned it to him. He could not recall whether he gave it to him at the same time he sublet the apartment to him or whether he did so several months later after Chambers had left the apartment. He had no recollection whatever of having transferred the car to the Cherner Motor Co. although he admitted that the signature on the transfer of title was his own. He said that it was possible that he could have given the car to Chambers and that Chambers could have given it back to him, and that he later could have transferred it to the Cherner Motor Co. but that he could not recall what happened.

"This much concerning the testimony in regard to the car can definitely be concluded. Hiss stated on August 16 and 17 that he sold or gave the car to Crosley (Chambers) at the same time that he sublet the apartment to him, and that at the time that he did this he had another car which he himself was using. A check of the records by the committee staff showed that Hiss did not acquire another car until several months after the apartment transaction was concluded and that he actually transferred the car over a year later to the Cherner Motor Co.

"His vague and evasive testimony on this transaction raises a doubt as to other portions of his testimony. In this connection, it should be observed that on 198 occasions Hiss qualified his answers to questions by the phrase "to the best of my recollection" and similar qualifying phrases, while Chambers, on the other hand, was for the most part forthright and emphatic in his answers to questions.

* * * * *

"The committee again calls upon the Attorney General to forward to the Congress at the earliest possible date recommendations for strengthening the espionage laws so that they will be adequate to deal with the Communist conspiracy.

* * * * *

"It is also imperative that the Attorney General proceed promptly to call the New York special grand jury back into session to consider his recommendations on the disposition of the evidence he has placed before it. The public has the clear right to have this proceeding concluded by indictments where indicated, by a no true bill where warranted, and by a full report by the Attorney General on his disposition of the case.

* * * * *

"The final report will not be delayed a day beyond that necessary to complete the vast amount of investigation, interrogation, and exploration which lies ahead of us and the staff investigators and subcommittees which will move forward diligently on this vital matter."

RECENT DISCLOSURES

Subsequent to the public confrontation before this committee, Chambers repeated his charges against Alger Hiss in a radio program in response to a challenge by Hiss to do so. Thirty days later Alger Hiss brought suit against Whittaker Chambers in Federal court in Baltimore, Md., charging libel and slander. November 17 pretrial depositions were being taken by the attorneys for Mr. Hiss, and during the examination of Chambers he was asked, in substance, whether he had any documentary material to support his allegations.

Thereupon Chambers submitted a number of typewritten documents which he said Hiss had given him. Chambers said these documents had been copied from State Department records, most of which were very confidential and classified as restricted to high Government officials for use and knowledge.

Alexander Campbell, head of the Criminal Division of the Department of Justice, was called in immediately, and the material was turned over to him. The various participants in the deposition were directed, in the interest of national security, to keep silent on the whole matter. On December 11, 1948, there appeared in the column of a Washington newspaper an item to the effect that new and sensational information had been submitted in the Hiss-Chambers controversy. Later the same day the United Press stated:

"[From the Washington Daily News of December 1, 1948]

"HISS AND CHAMBERS PERJURY PROBE HITS DEAD END

"The Justice Department is about ready to drop its investigation of the celebrated Alger Hiss-Whittaker Chambers controversy, it was learned today.

"Department officials still have 'under study' the question of a possible perjury prosecution. But officials said privately that unless additional evidence is forthcoming they are inclined to forget the whole thing.

"The perjury question arose when Mr. Chambers, an admitted ex-Communist, who is now with Time magazine, charged under oath that Mr. Hiss was a member of a prewar Communist underground in official Washington. Mr. Hiss, a former State Department official, denied it—also under oath.

"Their conflicting statements were made during House Un-American Activities Committee's hearings last summer on Communists in the Government. The committee turned their testimony over to the Justice Department for a perjury investigation.

"One Department source said that on the basis of available evidence officials in charge of the case believe it would be unwise to take it before a grand jury. But he emphasized this attitude could change overnight if the House committee or the Department's investigator dig up some new evidence.

"The FBI has taken part in the Department's investigation. Attorney General Tom C. Clark has assigned the case to Special Assistant John Ford Baecher and United States Attorney George Morris Fay."

The suggestion of the United Press story greatly disturbed members of the committee who had, all this time, continued to press their own investigation. On the same day Representative RICHARD NIXON and the chief investigator to the committee, Robert E. Stripling, proceeded to Westminster, Md., to question Mr. Chambers, and to obtain, if possible, any evidence in his possession which related to espionage or other illegal activities. Mr. Chambers, when questioned by Mr. NIXON, stated that he had been informed he would be in contempt of court if he discussed what he had submitted at Baltimore, at the pretrial hearing.

Chambers did not tell Mr. NIXON what evidence he had submitted at the pretrial examination except that he indicated it was highly important. That night when the chief investigator and Mr. NIXON returned to Washington, representatives of the FBI were immediately informed of the conversation.

The following morning, upon instructions of the committee, a subpena was issued for Chambers calling upon him to produce all documents or material in his possession dealing with this case. While this was not the first subpena served upon Chambers by the committee, it was the first subpena calling for documents.

It should also be remembered that no other Government agency had ever before issued a subpena upon Chambers calling for documents, though he had, in September, been summoned to New York before a special Federal grand jury on espionage as a result of the disclosures he had made in his first public hearings by this committee the month previous. When he received the committee subpena for papers on December 2, Chambers said he was prepared to turn over all information in his possession, and thereafter he was accompanied by committee investigators Wheeler and Appell to his home in Westminster, Md., where he produced the five rolls of microfilm.

Three rolls were encased in a lightproof metal cylinder sealed with tape. However, one of the cylinders had been mashed or opened previously, and Chambers informed the investigators at the time of handing them over that he felt sure that this roll had been light-struck and would be worthless. These three rolls of film, he informed the committee agents, were undeveloped. The other two rolls had been developed and were wrapped in oilpaper.

The two agents marked and identified the developed film and unopened containers and returned to Washington, arriving about midnight. Investigator Appell locked the film in his bureau in his home and brought it in to the committee offices at 9:15 the following morning. It was submitted to the chief investigator, who examined the developed film through an enlarging equipment and determined that secret and confidential documents of the State Department were pictured thereon.

He then instructed Mr. Wheeler to proceed with the developed film to the laboratory of a photographic technician in the Treasury Department, for the purpose of taking enlarged pictures.

Mr. Appell, upon instruction, proceeded to the photographic laboratory of the Veterans' Administration with the undeveloped film, where a photographic expert formerly with the FBI carefully developed and preserved the evidence in full.

The committee wishes to emphasize that this film received expert technical attention from the time it was received by the committee from Mr. Chambers to the present time, and that none was destroyed or lightstruck after it was surrendered to the committee.

IMPORTANCE OF THE EVIDENCE

State Department officials have testified before the committee that publication of some of these documents even today, more than 10 years after they were originally written would endanger the national security.

An indication of the wide diversity of the subjects covered, and the confidential character of the messages involved, can be obtained by referring to the appendix of this volume, in which are reproduced those documents which have been approved for release by the State Department.

Perhaps the most significant and disturbing feature is the fact that Messrs. Sumner Welles, John Peurifoy, and Francis B. Sayre, present or past high State Department officers, all agree that with documents of this type in their possession, agents of foreign governments would be able to break the most secret diplomatic codes of the United States.

Following is an excerpt from the testimony of Mr. Sayre:

"Mr. NIXON. Mr. Sayre, in this connection I have been somewhat interested in comments of some columnists and, in fact, one case attributed to an anonymous source in the State Department—I say 'anonymous' because the official sources have spoken completely to the contrary on this point—to the effect that the information contained in these documents wasn't important anyway and it didn't make much difference if the Russians did get it or anything else.

"Do you agree there was nothing important or nothing wrong with turning this stuff over?

"Mr. SAYRE. I violently disagree, not only because of the substance of these cables, but because some of them were in the highly confidential codes.

"Now, some of those codes—for instance, the Gray code, so-called—I suspect that other governments had that, but they didn't have these highly confidential codes; and for these telegrams to get out at the time they did meant that other governments could crack our codes, and that, I think, is indescribably horrible.

"Mr. NIXON. In other words, it is not only a question of this information, but it is the question of the potential information which they might have obtained?

"Mr. SAYRE. By cracking the code, which gives them the run of the whole thing."

This, in fact, means that not only did the government which received these identified documents have access to the information available in them, but that they, without question, also had complete access to all of the secret and confidential messages transmitted by the State Department during the period involved, through knowledge of the code system. Since this was in the general historical era of the Stalin-Hitler pact, it is also likely that Nazi Germany and subsequently Japan may have known our State Department secret codes and communications, before and during the war.

It should also be kept in mind that the documents which Mr. Chambers turned over to the committee, and in the pretrial hearing, constitute only 1 week's supply of information and a very small proportion of the total volume which Chambers had transmitted to the Soviet Union prior to the time he decided to break with the Communist Party.

Chambers' testimony is that he first started to microfilm documents and transmit them to the Soviet Union in the early part of 1935, and that the operation had continued weekly until April 1938.

If the documents which have been released by the committee, only 1 week's fraction of the total volume which Chambers had obtained and transmitted to the Soviet agents, were the only documents which reached the Soviet Union, the committee would consider the effect on United States security serious enough.

However, the testimony of Whittaker Chambers is that during the 2 years previous to the receipt of this particular batch of documents, he had been running a veritable espionage production line out of the State Department and other departments of the Government, the output of which was being funneled to Moscow by way of a skillfully run transmission belt.

HOW CHAMBERS GOT THE DOCUMENTS

Chambers testified that he had two sources of information in the State Department. His principal source, from which he obtained most of the strictly confidential documents, operated in the following manner:

The source would bring the documents out in a brief case and take them home. There, Chambers would take over the brief case and go on to meet a photographic expert at a prearranged place. The expert would take the brief case and documents to a laboratory in Baltimore, put the documents on film, and would return the brief case and contents to Chambers the same night.

Sometimes Chambers stated it would be as late as 1 in the morning before he got the brief case back. He would then proceed to the home of his source, deliver the brief case, and the documents would be returned to the State Department files.

Chambers would then pick up the microfilms in Baltimore, place them in a tobacco pouch, and carry them to New York, where he would deliver them to a Colonel Bykov, of the Soviet espionage system, who was at that time known to Chambers only as Peter.

Because the committee does not wish to hamper the prosecution of cases under the jurisdiction of the Department of Justice, we are not making reference at this point to the names of the people whom Chambers has given as coconspirators in this criminal activity.

As far as the committee has been able to determine, Colonel Bykov had no official position in this country and was an illegally present alien spy.

The committee has taken the detailed testimony in as many aspects of this case as possible without interfering with the grand jury. It has before it evidence of the manner in which Colonel Bykov approached the sources of information within the Government and arranged, in cooperation with Chambers, for the furnishing of this information which Chambers swears was sent to the Soviet Union.

The leaders of the Russian underground in this country caused to be delivered to four high sources in the Federal Government, who had been unusually productive, expensive Russian Bokhara rugs, in appreciation for their unusual service to the Soviet Union. The committee at this time is withholding the names of the recipients and the details in order not to interfere in the present investigation of the Federal grand jury on espionage now convened in New York City.

However, at the proper time, we intend to make full disclosure, not only of this rug deal, but all matters of evidence, with specific details, as to one of the most serious espionage cases in the United States history.

Chambers testified that between 1932 and 1938 he obtained documents from the State Department, the Bureau of Standards, the Aberdeen Proving Ground, and certain information from the Navy; also that the same ring with which he worked got vital information from key United States industries. The documents pictured on the microfilm, which had been developed at the time we secured them from Chambers, were highly confidential and classified documents from the Department of State, the most important of which came from the office of Assistant Secretary of State Francis B. Sayre.

These documents bore the official stamp of Mr. Sayre and have been identified by him as having been taken from his office. Four people had access to these documents once they arrived at Mr. Sayre's office, namely, Francis B. Sayre, Alger Hiss, his first assistant; Eunice Lincoln, his administrative assistant; and Anna Belle Newcomb, secretary and stenographer for the office.

The committee had before it Mr. Sayre, Miss Lincoln, and Miss Newcomb; all emphatically denied under oath that they had ever turned any documents over to any unauthorized person.

The microfilmed documents in question, which were secret and confidential for the Secretary of State only and which were sent in the highest code, were delivered to Mr. Sayre's office from the code room of the State Department in a black metal box. When this box arrived at Mr. Sayre's office, it was opened by Miss Lincoln with a key provided for the office by the code room for that purpose only.

When Mr. Sayre's office had finished studying the documents, which sometimes took several days, the documents were placed back in the black box, locked by Miss Lincoln, and returned to the code room by code-room messengers, where, with duplicate key, the box was reopened and the contents filed in the code room's guarded record office.

The testimony of Mr. Sayre and Miss Lincoln brought out that it was a practice for both Mr. Sayre and Mr. Hiss to take documents in their brief case from the Department of State at night to their homes for study. Miss Newcomb and Miss Lincoln both testified that they had never taken any documents themselves from the State Department.

When Miss Lincoln and Miss Necomb were shown photostatic copies of the typewritten and handwritten documents which were submitted by Whittaker Chambers at the pretrial examination in Baltimore, both testified that these documents were not typed in the State Department and that the character and form of the documents were such that they could not have been prepared for the purpose of transmitting information in the regular course of State Department business.

Mr. Sayre testified that the handwritten memos had not been prepared by Mr. Hiss for him or under his instruction. Mr. Sayre also testified that he could see no reason why the typewritten documents could or would have been prepared in the regular course of State Department business. He denied that these typed or handwritten documents were brought to his attention.

The committee is satisfied, as a result of the technical investigation and determinations which have been made by typewriter experts, that it has been conclusively established where and on what machine these documents were typed.

In addition to the typewritten documents submitted at the pretrial examination in Baltimore, and in addition to the microfilms which Mr. Chambers submitted to the committee, Mr. Chambers also produced, at the pretrial examination, three documents written in the hand of Alger Hiss, the text of which appear in the appendix of this report.

When these documents were shown to Miss Newcomb, she testified that they were not of the type which Mr. Hiss would prepare in connection with the regular duties he performed in the office of Mr. Sayre.

Mr. Chambers also testified that he received and transmitted to Russian agents information concerning a new self-sealing aviation tank developed by the Navy, the metallurgical formula dealing with the Norden bomb sight, and the lists of foreign intelligence agents and naval intelligence reports.

THE EXTENT OF THE CONSPIRACY

The real dimensions of this case and its seriousness have been obscured to an extent by the controversy which has centered around Mr. Hiss and Mr. Chambers.

It now appears from the testimony and evidence before the committee that there were at the time when Chambers operated as a spy, parallel apparatuses functioning inside our Government with equal success, and that they have continued. The evidence clearly indicates that the Chambers apparatus continued to function for at least 1 year after he broke away, and it has now been clearly established that at least four of the individuals who were acting in the Chambers apparatus were also acting as late as 1945 in the parallel apparatus exposed to this committee by Elizabeth Bentley in the fall of 1948.

We have no evidence to indicate that the operations of this second apparatus do not continue to the present time. The committee knows that the desire on the part of Russian Communists for information from America is necessarily stronger today than it was before or during the war. We also know that the cooperative techniques existing between the Communists in Russia and the Communists in America are still intact, and that there are Communists in Government today.

"Take the State Department for example. Between January 1, 1947, and July 29, 1948, a total of 134 individuals were dismissed 'for security reasons' from the Department of State alone. The screening and dismissal program is still continuing and is still highly important to our national security. Between July 29, 1948, and December 16, another 17 individuals have been removed from the State Department rolls 'for security reasons.' Of the total figure of 151 State Department people removed from the Federal pay roll because of findings of the Department's security board, 91 cases might be classified as of acute significance and 60 cases classified as secondary risks or bad general security cases.

"America must remain alert to this grave danger within our gates and within the citadels of our protection since the conspiracies of Communist espionage are a current and continuing threat to our national peace and security."

The committee desires to emphasize, in citing these statistics from the State Department, it is not singling out the State Department for special criticism. At this time, this is the only department on which we have the current authentic statistics. It should be added that Assistant Secretary of State Peurifoy is doing a fine public service with his security officers in identifying those disloyal elements remaining in the State Department and in having them removed from the Federal pay roll. This committee expects to continue its full cooperation in helping to obtain this objective in the State Department, as well as in all other departments of the Government.

WHEN DID THE CONSPIRACY BEGIN?

Mr. Chambers has testified that he first became active as a courier for the Communist espionage ring in 1932, and that he had every reason to believe that the ring had been in operation for several years before that time. Chambers further testified that, several months after he broke with the Communist Party, he was informed by a member of the ring that another person had taken his place as courier for his apparatus.

GEOGRAPHICAL EXTENT OF THE OPERATION

In testimony which Mr. Chambers gave to the committee on December 28, the committee questioned him for over 5 hours concerning operations of the Communist underground involving other facts than the Hiss-Chambers case, as well as that specific apparatus. Mr. Chambers said the espionage ring recruited its personnel primarily in the United States for operation in other countries, including Japan, Germany, France, Finland, and China. Mr. Chambers also disclosed to the committee that, in his position as courier for the party, he on one occasion took a money belt from New York to San Francisco containing approximately $10,000 for the purpose of financing west coast spy operations.

ENORMITY OF CRIMES INVOLVED

We cannot overemphasize the enormity of the reprehensible crimes involved in the act of furnishing a foreign power with documents of vital security import. Here are crimes imperiling not merely a single individual but millions of Americans in the event of war and, as a matter of fact, the security of the Nation as a whole. Such acts precipitate wars, they destroy the fruits of martial victory, and they endanger the basic institutions of freedom upon which our liberties depend. They should receive the condemnation of all real Americans. They transcend in importance any considerations of partisanship or any bickerings between individuals or departments of government. All branches of government should cooperate in exposing the existence of these crimes and in bringing full punishment to all involved.

CONCLUSION

We have outlined now what has happened to date. There are two problems:

1. What can be done to punish and expose those who were responsible for what has happened in the past?

2. What can be done to avoid such a thing happening in the future?

The committee will continue to follow the definite leads developed through evidence now before it. We have agreed with the Department of Justice not to interrogate in public hearing a selected group of witnesses to be called in connection with prosecuting the perjury indictment of Alger Hiss. Consequently we are unable in this report to pursue to their logical ends many of the leads on which the committee has already developed substantial evidence. However, from the evidence at hand, we are convinced that by diligently pursuing its activities on this case our committee, if aided by equally diligent activities by the Department of Justice, will secure further indictments or confessions in connection with these espionage activities.

In connection with the problem of what can be done to avert the continuation or recurrence of espionage, we make the following recommendations:

1. Passage of legislation modeled substantially after the so-called Mundt-Nixon bill, which passed the House last year by a roll-call vote of 319 to 56.

2. The espionage laws of the United States should be substantially strengthened by early laws of the new Congress, with special attention to means for returning aliens to other countries upon conviction for crimes against the United States.

3. The penalties for those properly cited for contempt of Congress should be increased to a minimum of 5 years in prison and a $5,000 fine.

4. Our immigration laws and passport visa regulations should be carefully studied to determine what changes are necessary to prevent disloyal elements from entering this country and remaining here.

5. Finally we believe that the work of the committee and its far-reaching results provide a tribute to the foresight and persistence of the House of Representatives for creating and supporting for the past 10 years its own committee, which has been in the forefront of those forces combating the evil of communism which has become such an imminent threat today to our Christian civilization.

As a result of this decade of service, the House now has at its disposal the greatest file against un-American subversive forces which exists anywhere in the world today. The committee should be continued.

L'ENVOI

Our committee has learned with genuine regret that Chief Investigator Robert E. Stripling has submitted his resignation and is returning to his native State of Texas to enter private business.

It is our studied opinion that Bob Stripling has become one of the best informed men in the United States on the identities, the tactics, and the end objectives of the Communist conspiracy. He has few equals and no superiors in his knowledge of the treacherous methods of disloyal, un-American elements in this country.

At considerable sacrifice to himself and family he has for more than a decade suffered the carping criticisms of the Communist clique in this country and the uninformed attacks of honest citizens who have been misled by irresponsible reports of his activities and motives. He has been a bulwark in the fight to maintain freedom in America. It will be a task of unrivaled difficulty to find a replacement for him. Both in private life and as a soldier in the late war, Bob Stripling has been a splendid exemplification of the type of patriotic, clear-thinking, and unselfish young men upon whom America must depend and whose devotion to public service and duty is a credit to our way of life.

Unanimously approved by the subcommittee, December 30, 1948.

Now, Mr. Speaker, here are some of the documents which were released with the approval of the State Department. The first one is a document the experts say is in the handwriting of Alger Hiss.

Here it is:

March 3. Johnson, United States chargé at London, cabled that Lord Chatfield had told the naval attaché that, whether escalation was eventually decided or not, he would not change his plans for cruisers this year, and in any case, new battleships would not be laid down before the end of the current year.

[Date: December 6, 1948. EI/HJEG:ml, No. 1749]

To: Director, Inspection-Investigation Service.

From: Chief, Identification and Detection Division.

Subject: Handwriting examination of Hiss-Chambers case.

1. On this date, Mrs. Lillian E. Howard, representative of the Un-American Activities Committee, personally and informally submitted four photostatic copies of what appears to be handwritten notes identified as Q–1, Q–2, and Q–3. Mrs. Howard also submitted document identified as K–1, understood to bear the known writings of Alger Hiss. It is requested that the known writings of Alger Hiss appearing on K–1 be examined and compared with the questioned writings as they appear on exhibits marked Q–1, Q–2, and Q–3 to determine identity.

2. The writings above-mentioned were carefully examined and compared and as a result of such a study, it is concluded that the person responsible for the writings appearing on exhibit K–1 purported to be the known writings of Alger Hiss, also wrote the notes appearing on photostatic copies identified as Q–1, Q–2, and Q–3.

3. The evidence as submitted by Mrs. Howard was personally returned to her and the examination was made in her presence.

Reports from reliable source indicate that Hitler made unacceptable demands and that Austrian Government is now formulating counter proposals. Government inaccessible to Diplomatic Corps. Even French Minister who was promised appointment, has been unable to see Schmidt. It seems possible that Hitler is seeking foreign political triumph at the expense of Austria to redress adverse effect of party crisis.

Innsbruck correspondent of an American news agency reports Ribbentrop passed through today en route to Italy. Rumors from several sources alleged that Schuschnigg had long telephone conversations with Mussolin before proceeding to Berchtesgaden.

WILEY.

FAR EAST

February 11: Lockhart, United States counselor of Embassy at Peiping, cabled that reports indicate that the Japanese are continuing preparations for advances southward along the Peiping-Hankow Railway, and in Shansi. The number of Japanese troops going south on that railway has increased; the number of Japanese forces on the Taiyuan plain has been increasing; railway materials have been sent south, presumably for repair of the line destroyed south of Changteh; Japanese expeditions to cause the retirement of irregular forces west of the Peiping-Hankow Railway and north and south of the Shikiachuang-Taiyuan Railway have reportedly increased for the purpose of rendering flank attack against the Japanese more difficult. Rumors of a western movement of Japanese in Suiyan cannot be confirmed in Peiping.

February 11: Gauss, United States consul general in Shanghai, cabled that the University of Shanghai in the Yangtzepoo district, which was occupied by Japanese military and naval units, was adjacent to a golf course which was being used as an airfield.

EUROPE

ENGLAND, January 24.

Johnson, United States chargé at London, cabled that the United States military attaché informed him that a representative of the British Air Ministry had intimated that day that his authorities would probably request through the British Ambassador in Washington permission to purchase certain American aircraft. The first item will be not less than 12 Boeing B–17 models for delivery within 12 weeks.

The Air Ministry hopes special consideration will be given by the appropriate American authorities for release for sale of these Boeing machines and other aircraft to be specified later.

SPAIN

January 21: Bay, United States consul in Seville, cabled:

"Political optimism described in my December 7 has been rudely shaken by events of Teruel. Moral effect of the loss of that city far outweighs military significance but ultimate liquidation of the affair is expected by operation now developing. Information received from widely separated sources indicates General Franco was on the point of launching a drive on Guadalajara to take off from Jadraque with intention of completing encirclement of Madrid when attacked at Teruel. These circumstances are generally regarded as merely delaying final victory.

"Tightening of frontiers which still continues is attributed to plot against France. Information from German sources is to the effect that a number of civilians were recently executed in this connection at Caceros. Method of granting leaves to members military forces has been revised and restricted. Masters and crews of foreign merchantmen are not permitted to go ashore in Seville exception being made for ships of nations having relations with General Franco.

"Foodstuffs, especially meats, scarcer than last year and prices substantially higher. Hotels and restaurants still continue to serve articles not available in local markets. Retail stocks practically exhausted."

WARSAW

No. 38, March 29, 4 p. m.:

"One. I learn following in strictest confidence from Beck and his associates:

"(A) Beck gained distinct impression in conversations with Mussolini and Ciano during Beck's recent Rome visit that they both shared Beck's view in respect to Danubian Valley: whereas Italy focused its attention on the Mediterranean and Poland on the Baltic neither would like to see the hegemony of any country develop further in the Danubian Valley.

"(B) Of pertinent interest moreover during adjournment of Anglo-Italian conversations Mussolini had recently pointed out Italy was fundamentally interested in ascertaining the extent to which Britain would be interested in doing something to bring about economic and other appeasement in that area which had been disturbed by recent events (such as Austria). My informants added that in other words Mussolini's soundings on this score indicated Mussolini's interest in embarking on a potential counterpolicy vis-à-vis Germany's suspected aspirations in Danubian Valley; the counterpolicy envisaging economic assistance to rescue the Danubian and Balkan States from being swept into the German camp.

"Two. My informants added their opinion that Britain would probably be inclined to leave treatment of this problem in abeyance until current obstacles still retarding an Anglo-Italian solution of the problem in Spain will have been eliminated."

BIDDLE.

[Tokyo, February 12, 1938. Received 1:10 p. m.]

SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington.

100, February 12, noon. Strictly confidential:

"1. My British colleague who talks to me freely and so far as I can judge frankly, has told me of the following conversation with the Minister for Foreign Affairs on February 9 which would appear to be significant owing to the marked change in the Minister's usually placid, courteous, and friendly bearing. The fact that for the first time in our respective dealings with him Hirota twice lost his temper with Craigie might be due to nervousness engendered by the strain of the current sessions of the Diet or the mounting irritation at the tone, insistence, and volume of Craigie's continual representations both oral and written in connection with British interests in China or perhaps to both. The Minister's demeanor tends to confirm reports which have come to both Craigie and myself that Hirota is steadily becoming harder and more intransigent as regards foreign interests in the Far East and that it is Hirota rather than Suctsugu who leads the ultra chauvanistic element in the Government. I myself have as yet seen no outward demonstration of any change of attitude on Hirota's part as regards American interests.

"2. The conversation referred to arose when Craigie informed the Minister that he is in possession of evidence indicating that Japanese forces have occupied several of the smaller Chinese islands in the general vicinity of Hong Kong and again asked for specific assurances that the statements of the Japanese Government that it has no territorial designs in China apply as well to the islands as to the mainland. According to Craigie the Minister in some instances in their intercourse became very angry, inveighed against the continual British demands for renewed assurances, said that under present war conditions Japan had given all the assurances that can reasonably be expected, and asserted that if the warfare is prolonged Japan may be forced to occupy more territory whether insular or on the mainland. If the warfare becomes permanent, said Hirota, the occupation will also be permanent. Referring specifically to Hainan, Hirota said that the Japanese could not possibly give a permanent pledge not to occupy. Craigie pointed out that whereas Hong Kong cannot be regarded as a threat to Japan the occupation of these islands by Japanese forces does constitute a very real threat to Hong Kong. The general tone of this conversation appears to have been acrimonious.

"3. Craigie is aware that there are large concentration of Japanese troops in Formosa (see our 61, January 31, 6 p. m.) and of Japanese ships in the port of Takao and he believes that an attack on Canton or some other point in south China is impending.

"4. Craigie's general reaction to this conversation with Hirota is that the longer the warfare is prolonged the greater will be the likelihood of permanent occupation by Japan not only of the islands but of territory on the mainland. He believes that Japanese assurances of "no territorial designs" are likely to be withdrawn at short notice. These prospects so seriously concern British interests that he contemplates recommending or has already recommended to his Government (a) that continued support of Chiang Kai-shek, whether by furnishing war supplies and funds or otherwise, is detrimental to British interests and, (b) that the British Government should be alert to foster any outlook for peace negotiations which might leave to China any hope of eventual resurrection.

"5. Craigie is informed and believes that it was the Japanese industrialists and politicians and not the military who favored and brought about the withdrawal of recognition from the Central Government.

"6. I think that the nature of the conversation reported above indicates that our own practice of concentrating our representations to the Minister on important issues and with discreet timing is likely to prove more effective than the British practice of constantly hammering by almost daily notes, letters, and other communications with continual personal visits to the Minister or the Vice Minister both on important and routine issues. The British procedure appears to be based on the theory that constant hammering will wear away a stone but in the present temper of the Japanese Government and military this practice is liable to defeat its own object through the irritation which it inevitably engenders, clearly demonstrated in Craigie's last interview with the Minister. The representations of the American Government are at least listened to with respect and an evident inclination on the part of the Foreign Office to meet our wishes so far as the military can be influenced in that direction.

"7. About 2 weeks ago Craigie told me that he had heard from a trustworthy source that there was to be a change for the better in the Japanese attitude toward Great Britain and that press and other agitation against the British was to be discontinued. I did not put much stock in Craigie's information. Since then General Matsui in the interview which he gave to Woodhead sharply criticized the British for trying to create political issues out of the problem of preserving British economic and commercial interests in China while the Japanese press has expressed the conviction that it was Great Britian which initiated the three power démarche with regard to naval construction. The feeling in Japan against the British is not in our opinion altogether artifically created as Craigie believes it to be but flows from the conviction that the British are constantly endeavoring to establish a common front against Japan in order to preserve British political and economic interests in the Far East."

Repeat to Hankow.

FREW.

Mr. Speaker, here is a "strictly confidential" memorandum to the Secretary of State from the Honorable William C. Bullitt, dated February 16, 1938.

It reads as follows:

[Paris. Dated February 16, 1938.
Received 3:47 p. m.]

SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington.

249 February 16, 5 p. m. Strictly confidential for the Secretary:

The Austrian Minister has just read to me a telegram which he received this morning from Schuschnigg. It indicated that Schuschnigg has by no means given up hope of maintaining Austrian independence.

Schuschnigg had confidence that Seyss-Inquart, although a pan-German, would not work in an underhand manner for the introduction of Nazis into the regime.

Amnesty would be extended at once not only to Nazis but also to Social Democrats. This amnesty would, however, not include those who had emigrated from Austria thus excluding from the country all those Austrian Nazis who are now in Germany.

The right to conduct political propaganda would be extended not only to the Nazis, but also to the Monarchists and Social Democrats. Those Nazis who had been excluded from office and pensions because of their political opinions would have their pensions restored but would not be given their former offices.

The position of Schuschnigg was, I gathered, the following: That he would continue to struggle for Austrian independence; that he believed this independence could be maintained in the long run only if there should be reconciliation between England, France, and Italy; that he considered recognition of Ethiopia essential for any such reconciliation since the Italians were genuinely convinced that the British at some future date would attempt to drive the Italians out of Ethiopia which would mean the collapse of the Fascist regime in Italy.

Section 2. Schuschnigg felt that the actions which he was about to take would produce a temporary breathing period but in the end would prove to be just as unsatisfactory to Hitler as his actions which followed the accord of July 1936. He expected therefore that at some future date Germany would attempt again to repeat the Berchtesgaden coup and would mobilize if necessary on the Austrian frontier. He would make no further concessions. He could not attempt to fight Germany alone and if faced by German mobilization would have to resign.

The question of Austrian existence as an independent state therefore depended on the possibility that before Hitler again should become sufficiently irritated to mobilize on the Austrian frontier there might be reconciliation between England, France, and Italy and an agreement between those states to support Austrian independence.

The Austrian Minister added that he believed the extension of amnesty to the Social Democrats would add greatly to the strength of Schuschnigg's regime as the Social Democrats would be the strongest opponents of a gradual nazification of Austria.

In contradiction of the opinions expressed above with regard to Seyss-Inquart I was told this morning by a gentleman who says he knows Seyss-Inquart intimately that the latter is a 100 percent Nazi by conviction although a devout Catholic and that he will insert Nazis gradually into all vital posts and strike for a decision in a few months.

AUSTRIA, GERMANY

February 16: Wiley, United States chargé at Vienna, cabled the Cabinet changes approved by Miklas the preceding night, adding that he was informed through official sources that the German Government had demanded action on its requests by midnight and had staged an impressive military demonstration along the frontier.

February 14: Gilbert, United States chargé at Berlin, cabled that Hemmen, former German counselor of Embassy at Buenos Aires and the negotiator of the Canadian-German commercial agreement of 1935 and the German-French agreement of 1937 and now in the economic section of the Foreign Office, was being sent to the United States. He would travel around securing economic information and would be available after the signature of the United States-British trade agreement to discuss possibilities of negotiating a trade agreement between Germany and the United States.

February 17: Phillips cabled from Rome that Ciano said that while the inclusion of Seyss-Inquart in the Cabinet meant "a pronounced increase of German influence in Austria he nevertheless felt that it was far better to have cooperation between the two governments since any increase of Austrian opposition or hostility to Germany might of itself be an invitation to Hitler to take some drastic step. Ciano also told me that there would be very much closer cooperation between the German and Austrian Armies and that during the next year there would be an exchange of high ranking officers between the two armies."

February 18: Gilbert, United States chargé at Berlin:

"The military attaché reports that as a result of numerous conversations and discussions with army sources he is convinced that the agreement reached with Austria as a result of the Hitler-Schuschnigg conversations contains military clauses providing for the gradual 'assimilation' of the Austrian Army into the German.

"Presumably this military agreement covers: (1) Unification of tactical doctrine through adoption of similar textbooks, (2) Austrian adoption of German military organization, (3) gradual introduction of uniform weapons, (4) coordination of war plans.

"The military attaché believes that within the relatively near future there will be evidence of a military alliance through the appointment of standing military missions by each country to the other country.

"As a corollary of the foregoing it is believed here that further changes in the Austrian Government will be announced shortly which will include the appointment of a pro-German Chief of Staff of the Austrian Army."

JAPAN

On March 30 the Department cabled to the United States legations at Costa Rica and at Panama:

"The Department has learned from a presumably reliable source that certain Japanese have approached the E. W. Creevy Trading Co. with respect to the possible purchase of a manganese mine said to be owned by that company on Cocos Island."

March 31. The United States Legation at Panama replied:

"Neither of Creevys in Panama since December nor has shown active interest in Panama manganese although reported developing Guanacaste, Costa Rica, deposits. No manganese deposit or Creevy interest in Costa Rican Cocos Island heard of in presumably informed sources in Panama but confirmation by the legation at San José is suggested.

"Creevys reputedly capable of such deal or of publicizing fictitious foreign offer for promotion purchases."

April 1. United States Legation at San José, Costa Rica, cabled that there were no manganese deposits on Cocos Island, that the Creevys had available 4,000 tons of the Guanacaste coast of Cocos Bay.

March 31. The Fourth Regiment of United States Marines stationed at Peiping (?) cabled that one regular Japanese division had recently been transferred from central China to Japan.

March 23. United States consul at Dairen in a cable referring to commercial treatment of American products stated that a few days before a permit entry had been granted for 1,000 American motortrucks purchased by the authorities in Hsinking.

My telegram February 14, 9 p. m.

Dined last night at a large dinner given by Schmidt with Chancelor Schuschnigg, Seyss-Inquart, members of the Government and diplomatic corps. Atmosphere most oppressive. To French Minister Schuschnigg described visit to Berchtesgaden as the most horrible day of his life. He says that Hitler undoubtedly a madman with a mission and in complete control of Germany. Hitler openly told him of his desire to annex Austria and declared that he could march into Austria with much greater ease and infinitely less danger than he incurred in remilitarization of the Rhineland. Schuschnigg admits that appointment of Seyss-Inquart is highly dangerous but states that he will make it in order to avert the worst. In respect of Italy, Schuschnigg declared that he can count only on moral not material support.

Schuschnigg is attempting to make best of bad situation and was in a long and friendly conversation with Seyss-Inquart. Hornbostel is in utter despair and states openly that there is nothing left for him to do but to leave Foreign Office.

Italian minister claims that he was informed of Berchtesgaden meeting on the 11th and denied that Italy took any initiative in the matter. He telegraphed full information to Mussolini. Latter however is engaged in winter sports and up to last night Ghigi had no information that his messages had reached the Duce. Italian Minister gives anxious impression.

Papal Nuncio admits that Seyss-Inquart may be good Catholic but fears nevertheless that it is the beginning of the end.

The French minister who has been here 5 years states that this is the most critical moment since July 1934. "It is not the end. It is the moment before the end." In his opinion Austria can only be saved by immediate reconciliation of France and England with Italy and energetic joint act. Enderrs author of May constitution made identical remark this morning.

In my opinion Austria's situation is most unfortunate and menacing. If Seyss-Inquart is loyal his appointment would not be a solution. If he is disloyal it is a catastrophe. Germany probably plans gradual Danzigfication and any unsupported efforts of Schuschnigg may make to outmaneuver Seyss-Inquart can at best only retard this process.

Repeated by telegraph to Paris, London, Berlin, and Rome.

WILEY.

March 26, Lane, United States Minister at Belgrade, cabled:

"Minister of War restated to me yesterday that construction of Yugoslav fortifications on German frontier which was initiated prior to anschluss is proceeding. Yugoslav Government now evincing active interest in coming to agreement with Standard Vacuum Oil Co. respecting duty on crude oil due to military necessity of gasoline reserves. General Maric discounted importance of recent incidents in northern part of the country attributing them to local political rather than to international causes.

"Assistant Minister for Foreign Affairs said to me this morning that general European situation appears calmer; that Hitler will not attack Czechoslovakia realizing that such action would lead to general coalition against Germany, and that war will probably be averted for 2 years at least."

Now, Mr. Speaker remember the preceding documents were released to the press on Sunday, December 12, 1948.

The next set which I submit were released December 16, 1948. The first document, according to experts, was in the handwriting of Alger Hiss and reads as follows:

About March 2, United States Embassy in Paris cabled that although France was permitting shipment of military supplies to China via Indochina only to fill existing orders, it was understood that this restriction was being liberally construed. For instance, the military attaché had learned that China had recently placed an order in France for 30 Potez-63 planes, one of the latest French types, a light bomber-pursuit.

Here are some more. Remember that these documents were not released by the committee until the State Department had been consulted. They read as follows:

Reliable source reports that since signing the Tripartite Anti-Comintern Pact an agreement has been reached whereby complete Italian and German military aircraft engineering and designing data, plus the services of technical advisers, are made available to Japan.

A Shanghai Mail report states that German experts on ordnance and airplane matters are now in Japan.

American military attaché at Hangkow paints gloomy picture of China's present military plight. States that a Chinese counter-offensive is unthinkable and he doesn't believe a force that can offer serious resistance can now be created.

Japanese are reported to be moving 80,000 fresh troops from Japan via Mukden. First of these troops arrived at Mukden on December 17. Believes they are destined for the northern frontier. Barracks with a capacity of 50,000 troops are reported to have been erected at Chaimussu and Poli in northeast Manchuria. Other barracks with capacities for 100,000 troops are reported to be located between railroads which are rapidly being pushed to the Mongolian and northeast frontiers. Japanese agents are reported to be fomenting action by Mohammedans in Ninghsia and Chenghi to harass the Urunchi-Lanchow Road.

A-S.

MR. SAYRE: I am returning the German aide-memoire which you sent me on November 23 together with a memorandum by Mr. Darlington.

The position taken in this memorandum seems to me entirely sound. There is much to be said for the view that a continued unsympathetic attitude on our part would tend to weaken further the position of the more moderate elements in the German bureaucracy. Moreover, when our concessions to be made to the United Kingdom and Canada are withheld from Germany, economic pressure on Germany will be increased and the drive toward autarchy will be given greater impetus, results diametrically opposed to what we are striving to achieve through the trade-agreements program.

It is not the intention of course that any public steps be taken to conclude a trade agreement with Germny prior to the elections in the fall of this year. However, the period between now and then might well be utilized in carrying on informal and confidential exploratory discussions with a view to working out answers to the difficult questions involved.

Mr. Darlington points out that a trade agreement with Germany holds greater possibilities for an expansion of our exports, particularly of agricultural products, than an agreement with any other country, and that such an agreement would probably be an important force making for world peace. These points seem to me to be also well taken.

If a memorandum indicating a readiness to enter into exploratory discussions were given to the German Embassy it would be desirable to inform them that such discussions must be of an informal and confidential character.

Since the subject is of such outstanding importance, I believe it would be desirable for it to be further discussed with the interested division. I believe that you will wish, therefore to send the file next to Eu, since it has not yet been seen by that division, and then back to EA for consideration of our comment.

HARRY C. HAWKINS.

March 29: Carr, United States Minister at Prague, cabled a summary of the Prime Minister's speech of the 28th. After noting the reference in the speech to future minority measures, Carr said "no mention made of new measures though they are probable since in addition to Chamberlain's suggestion we know that British and German ministers think further measures and improved administration essential."

March 28: Phillips, United States Ambassador at Rome, quoted the communiqué in the Informazione Diplomatica on Chamberlain's speech. In referring to the communiqué's warning against French intervention in Spain, Phillips said:

"There is every evidence that the Italian Government is seriously preoccupied over the possibility that France may intervene actively in behalf of the Spanish Government forces. One such indication is the effort to speed up negotiations with Great Britain, two conversations between Ciano and Perth having taken place over the week end."

Yokohman reports that Mr. Aikawa is scheduled to sail from Japan on the M. S. Shichibu Maru February 24 for the United States. According to a newspaper item in the Japan Advertiser Mr. Aikawa hopes to raise $300,000,000, in the United States. Another Japanese newspaper item states that the success of Mr. Aikawa's efforts in the United States depends upon Mr. Aikawa's ability and upon the attitude of the American Government toward his venture.

My 241, March 23, 7 p. m.

I have just finished an hour's talk with Grandi, who recently returned from Italy.

First, he is vitally concerned regarding America's opinion of Italy. Second, he informed me that the agreement with England will positively go through within the next few weeks; the Spanish situation will not stop the agreement, settlement of that problem being taken care of. Third, he impressed me with the fact that the Italians will heave a sigh of relief on making this deal with England, which will relieve them of being so closely identified with Germany. In answer to Moffat's letter to me of March 14, I would say that in my opinion the successful conclusion of this agreement would definitely weaken Italy's connection with Germany.

Grandi was not particularly flattering in his opinion of Goering; Hitler we did not discuss. He is very impressed with Chamberlain and says that he has enjoyed the last month in England more than the previous 5½ years because of the Prime Minister's attitude.

EUROPE

January 5. Bullitt cabled from Paris that Leger, in charge of the Foreign Office in Delbos' absence, had told him that the French Government was very apprehensive lest the United States become involved with Japan. Leger said that alone Britain would do nothing in the Far East, no matter how insulted. But if the United States should go to war with Japan, Britain would join in and this would leave France alone in Europe. Leger said that in such an eventuality Germany and Italy would strike at once and France would be no match for them.

January 12: Bullitt cabled that Prunas, new Italian chargé in Paris, had told him that Germany and Italy had reached complete agreement as to Austria and that Italy did not object to Germany's taking over Austria. Bullitt asked whether in that event the 300,000 Tyroleans might not become a danger to Italy. Prunas replied that it was already agreed that the Tyroleans would emigrate to Germany. Germany had expressed a desire for farm laborers and some 25,000 had already been sent. When this was completed Italy would be safe at the Brenner.

January 12: Bullitt cabled that Delbos had told him that Poncet reported from Berlin that the Germans would agree to a limitation of production of military planes and that in general prospects for a French-German rapprochement were encouraging. Delbos said in addition that he believes there was complete understanding between Germany and Italy as to Austria.

ENGLAND

On March 29, Kennedy, United States Ambassador to London, cabled about the British desire to proceed without delay with discussions under paragraph 3 of article 25, The cable added:

"Captain Wilson in conversation with Admiralty officials was told that the British are anxious to fix a limit of about 42,000 tons which they believe will give a well-balanced ship carrying nine 16-inch guns. They feel that the next higher logical limit would be about 47,000 tons, providing a balanced ship of twelve 16-inch guns."

On March 30 Hull replied by cable agreeing to proceed at once with the discussions under paragraph 3 of article 25.

A typed dispatch of February 26 from the American Minister to The Hague referred to his dispatch No. 182, dated Februray 14, "Wherein it was reported that a secret understanding has existed since 1934 between the Netherlands and British air forces."

GERMANY

On March 30, Wilson, United States chargé at Paris, sent cable No. 497, 8 p. m., as follows:

"A German friend formerly in the diplomatic service who maintains relations with Von Neurath has just arrived here from Berlin. He tells me that the leaders of the party are urging Hitler to move quickly against Czechoslovakia in order to take advantage of the favorable situation created by French weakness and British unpreparedness. Their thought is that when the Czechoslovak proposal for dealing with minorities is known it should be treated as a sort of Berchtesgaden arrangement, denounced as unsatisfactory, disorders to take place in the Sudeten country with an appeal for the assistance of German troops.

"My informant said that Von Neurath and others were playing for time and counseling that no aggressive action be taken at least until after Hitler's visit to Rome."

ITALY

April 1, Wilson, United States consul at Genoa, cabled:

"Have just heard from reliable confidential source that order issued last Tuesday placing fleet from La Spezia to French boundary under 6 hours sailing orders has now been canceled."

FAR EAST

March 28. Grew, United States Ambassador to Tokyo, cabled that the commercial attaché had been informed by an official of the Bank of Japan of the following gold shipments (presumably to the U. S.): 20,000,000 yen on March 27 via the Kinkwa Maru, 20,000,000 yen via the Komaki Maru on April 8, and 30,000,000 yet via the Titibu Maru on April 9.

United States Marine detachment at Tientsin reported by naval radio on March 28 as follows:

"During 21–28 March approximately 700 Japanese wounded or sick evacuated via Chinwangtao. No unusual troop movements. Hospital ship unloading supplies, nature undetermined."

January 22: From Tsingtao, Dorn, of the United States military attaché's staff, cabled that the Japanese landed one battery of truck-drawn 10-centimeter howitzers and four batteries of horse-drawn 77-millimeter guns.

January 22: Johnson, United States Ambassador to China, cabled from Hankow the following message from Stillwell, United States military attaché, for the War Department:

"One. Military situation Yangtze Valley unchanged. Death of Liu Hsiang and appointment of Chang Chou as Szechwan Governor gives Central Government better hold on Szechwan. Japanese making progress toward Hsuchowfu along railroad from south. Believe Hsuchowfu will not hold long.

"Two. Reliable report from foreigner with long experience in northwest indicates heavy traffic on (?) Lanchow (?) highway. Estimates 1,500 heavy Russian trucks operating hauling munitions. Daily arrivals Lanchow 100 to 200 trucks. He has counted 400 in one day. Saw 4 Russian tanks and over 50 Russian planes at Lanchow on January 1. Highway being surfaced throughout. Large gangs Chinese laborers working. Seven hundred Russian mechanics, chauffeurs, etc., quartered in village near Lanchow handling transport. Individual truck capacity 4 tons. Russians are chauffeurs west of Lanchow; only Chinese chauffeurs east thereof."

January 27: Lockhart, of the United States Embassy in China, cable from Peiping that on January 25 a Japanese officer had ordered the evacuation of the science, chemistry, and biology buildings of the National Tsinghua University. All equipment would have to be removed by January 27. The officer explained that the buildings would simply be borrowed for use as barracks for 3 or 4 months and were needed for housing part of the 20,000 Japanese troops that were to arrive in Peiping shortly.

January 28: Harrison, United States Minister at Geneva, cabled that he "learned this morning in strict confidence from vice president of board of managers of Swiss National Bank that Japan has been putting out feelers regarding possibility of obtaining a large loan in Switzerland. He gave me to understand that the Swiss National Bank is definitely unfavorable."

January 28: Lockhart cabled from Peiping that American military observers at Peiping estimate that 60 trucks and 18 narrow-gage locomotives arrived in North China between January 19 and January 25. According to French observers 10,000 effectives arrived in North China and 3,000 departed during first two weeks in January.

January 29: Sholes, United States consul at Milan, cabled that "80 Italian aircraft and 50 Italian airmen, some recently returned from Spanish front, it would appear, have been ordered to Japan. Embassy was informed aircraft shipments January 25 last. My British colleague called upon me today. His figures place aircraft sent at 50."

January 29: Lockhart, of United States Embassy at Peiping, cabled that as a result of the protests of the United States the Japanese military authorities had decided not to quarter troops in the Tsinghua University buildings.

January 30: Grew cabled from Tokyo that the United States military attaché had supplied him with a memorandum stating substantially the following:

"An unusually large number of Japanese troops has been assembled in Formosa, one estimate from Warner at Taihoku running as high as 100,000. Great secrecy is being maintained regarding this force, and it has been impossible to determine its strength, composition, or location.

"However, the presence on the island of Formosa of anything beyond the normal garrison, which is usually not greater than 10,000 men, is significant at this time." The memorandum added that Formosa is obviously in no danger of attack by the Chinese and is a good base for attacks on Amoy and other coastal cities.

January 31: Hull cabled Phillips, United States Ambassador to Rome, to investigate fully the report of the United States consul at Milan that 80 Italian aircraft and 50 airmen had been ordered to Japan. Hull said that President Roosevelt was disturbed that a number of Italian aircraft and especially aviators of the regular or reserve forces should be ordered to Japan. Hull added that if Phillips' investigation showed any basis for the report he would probably ask Phillips to make a direct inquiry of Italy.

February 2: Lockhart cabled that he had been informed that the decision not to quarter troops in Tsinghua University had been changed and the original plan would be adhered to.

February 2: Grew cabled from Tokyo that the British Ambassador informed him that war supplies to China through Hong Kong had been furnished by countries according to the following percentages: Germany, 62 percent; Italy, 21 percent; France, 12 percent; and Great Britain, 3 percent. The remainder were divided between Belgium and the United States. Craigie had told Grew that he took particular pleasure in communicating these figures to the Japanese Vice Minister for Foreign Affairs.

Now, here is a very interesting letter which discloses that back in 1937 there was sentiment in some quarters of the State Department for trade relations between the United States and Germany. It reads as follows:

DECEMBER 31, 1937.

MR. HAWKINS: I am returning the aide-memoire which was handed to Mr. Welles by the German Ambassador on October 21, 1937, and sent to you by Mr. Sayre for comment on November 23.

We have come, I feel, to a rather important point in our commercial relations with Germany. Over 2 years have passed since Germany ceased to enjoy most-favored-nation treatment in this country; a year and 9 months ago the Germans made their proposal for the restoration of that treatment; a year and a half ago the imposition of countervailing duties was announced; and a year has elapsed since trade was resumed on the basis outlined in the Treasury Department's release of December 23, 1936. Since German-American commercial relations first reached a stage of advanced deterioration considerable time has slipped away without any constructive step having been taken by this country to place them on a better footing.

During this time, moreover, we have given the German Government no encouragement whatever to take such a step. We did not invite or reply to its earlier proposals; we have expressed ourselves on several occasions in terms critical of its commercial policy; and in the memorandum handed to the German Ambassador in July to which the present German aide-memoire is a reply we offered the German Government no incentive to respond even in terms cordial to our commercial policy, much less with a concrete and constructive proposal.

In these circumstances it seems to me that considerable importance is to be attached to the conciliatory language in which the German aide-memoire is written and to the constructive nature of its general tone. I would like to call your attention particularly to the following passages:

"The German Government shares the opinion expressed in the aide-memoire of the Department of State of July 21 of this year that the most-favored-nation treatment is the best and safest foundation of international trade. The German Government has advocated and adhered to this opinion for decades. The application of the principle of most-favored-nation treatment, however, finds its limitation in the necessity of self-preservation of the nation. If Germany today, in her international trade practice, does not put this principle into effect fully it is not because she desires to replace it by a better, so-called bilateral system; it is because the German Government against its desire, has been compelled to take recourse to emergency measures the draw-backs of which it fully realizes and the detrimental effects of which have repeatedly and clearly been pointed out by Reichsbankpräsident Dr. Schacht, the author of the so-called New Plan. * * *

"The German Government is entirely willing to adjust its trade policy to the principle of free exchange of goods as soon as the necessary prerequisites have been established in the other parts of the world, namely within the field of general currency stabilization, solution of the debt problem, and equal access to raw materials. The prerequisites cannot be produced by Germany in her present financial and economic situation. They must be brought about by those states that have disturbed the equilibrium within the other spheres.

"The German Government regrets that the United States up to now has not seen its way to cooperate in finding an interim solution which would have furnished a practical contribution to the realization of its repeatedly declared intention of increasing international exchange of goods.

"Germany is ready and willing to accord to the United States the same favorable treatment as it does to any other country. * * *

"The German Government which has expressed far-reaching acknowledgement of the principles of American trade policy, has repeatedly endeavored to place the trade relations between Germany and the United States upon a new foundation guaranteeing the extension of their mutual exchange of goods.

"The German Government believes to be in accord with the Government of the United States that a just balance of the economic interests of Germany and the United States on the markets of third countries must be counted among those factors which can serve international economic development and the establishment of universal peace, and that this balance will be achieved if the economic competition of the two peoples is guided by fairness and mutual respect."

When the German Ambassador presented this aide-memoire to the Acting Secretary on October 21, he asked Mr. Welles if he would study it with sympathetic consideration and if he "would likewise please make an effort to read not only the lines but between the lines as well." This desire, that we should read "between the lines," was expressed in these same words on another occasion by the First Secretary of the German Embassy who, I understand, was responsible, with the Ambassador, for drafting the aide-memoire. The First Secretary in this conversation also stated that Germany is in a position now to go considerably further in what it can offer to make possible an understanding with the United States than it was in the spring of 1936.

The memorandum of Mr. Welles' conversation with Herr Dieckhoff continues, after the above passage, as follows:

"He said this memorandum was the result of his own conversations with his Government in Berlin when he was recently there and was due to his efforts to try to prepare the ground for a more favorable understanding by the German Government of the policy of the United States with regard to a more liberal trade tendency. The Ambassador said that he thought perhaps this memorandum would prepare the way for a further exchange of views between the two Governments, which he hoped would be constructive and lead to a more normal trade relationship between Germany and the rest of the world."

It is true, of course, that the aide-memoire, as EA points out, contains a certain amount of the old argumentation attempting to justify Germany's present policies and does not offer specifically and in detail any "new constructive basis for rearranging German-American trade relations."

The numerous passages quoted above, however, give it also another aspect and make it capable of another construction. Its whole tone, the references to an interim solution, and the Ambassador's statements surely provide grounds for the belief that the German Government's attitude toward the broad problem of Germany's commercial relations with the United States may have undergone an appreciable change and that that Government may now be ready to make an effort, considerably greater than it made in the spring of 1936, to reach an agreement with us. EA, it appears, recognizes this aspect of the aide-memoirs in suggesting, as one of three possible courses of action now open to us, that we might "put aside all argument and attempt to formulate a proposal stating the terms on which we might restore Germany's most-favored-nation privileges."

Whether or not we go this far, it would certainly seem to be not the best policy for us to devote all our attention to the unfavorable aspect of the aide-memoire, to ignore its favorable aspect, and to be influenced by so doing into giving an unsympathetic reply which would constitute a rebuff to such overtures as the German Government may be making in it.

Then, Mr. Speaker, the State Department official goes on to show how he thought the United States would benefit from relations with Germany. Here is what he says:

The maintenance of an unsympathetic attitude by this Government is not to the disadvantage of Germany alone: It has unfortunate consequences also for us. Three of immediate significance may be mentioned first:

(a) Of paramount importance is the reaction that failure on our part to respond to German overtures has upon the position of the moderates in government and business in Germany who are seeking to restrain the party extremists. The old German civil service is still largely intact and, while in many ministries it has been diluted by the infiltration of party members, its influence under the surface, especially in the Foreign Office where a minimum of party men have gained entrance, is considerable. This influence, as is well known, has been exercised to temper the policies of the party, and has been a constant element making for moderation and restraint. A continued negative attitude on our part toward Germany and German overtures plays directly into the hands of the party extremists, and correspondingly weakens the position of the men in the various ministries who might like to see Germany's commercial policies shaped more in harmony with ours, and who could advocate our point of view in Berlin, more effectively than we can, if they were provided with some basis upon which to do it. It might be in our interest, on one occasion at least, to give them something to go on; some ammunition to use against the party men; some help in the struggle in which they face such great odds—and see what they can make of it.

(b) The reaction of our continued unsympathetic attitude upon the German Government, and hence upon our remaining trade with Germany, is to be considered. We made no reply to the German proposals of March 1936, believing none to be necessary. Despite our silence, the German Government has taken advantage of the occasion provided by the exchange of views between the two Governments on the limited question of our conversations of last summer with representatives of the Brazilian Government to raise again the question of the general commercial relations between Germany and the United States. This move comes at a time when the 4-year plan is entering its second year. If our decision now is to give a reply of negative nature to the German aide-memoire, we may expect that the German Government will wait a considerable time before it presents us with a similar opportunity of examining what it may have to offer, without ourselves taking the initiative. During this time the 4-year plan may be counted upon to develop with a minimum of regard to our formerly very great interest in the German market.

(c) The divergence between our present method of carrying on trade with Germany and our proclaimed commercial policy, and the unfortunate reactions of this situation, also bear mention. At present a large part of the trade between the United States and Germany is being carried on on the basis of the four procedures listed in the Treasury Department's press release of December 23, 1936, and in particular upon the basis of procedure No. 2. The effect of this procedure has been to create inland accounts in German banks analogous in all essential respects to ASKI, and to make possible a substantial volume of trade of a kind which the United States holds to be contrary to the requirements of the most-favored-nation principle and which it has endeavored to persuade Brazil to curtail. In German eyes, and possibly also in other foreign quarters, this situation is damaging to the prestige of American commercial policy, in that it gives that policy a two-faced appearance. Moreover, this method of carrying on trade is so obviously different from what it pretends to be that it cannot but have cast a shadow of discredit upon our commercial policy in the eyes of those familiar with it at home. In the absence of an agreement placing trade between the two countries on a new basis, which will not be achieved so long as we maintain our present attitude, it is difficult to see any remedy to this situation.

Failure to find a satisfactory basis for our trade with Germany will also have unfortunate ultimate consequences for us. Two may be discerned in particular:

(a) Increased economic pressure on Germany as our trade-agreements program develops (particularly when the concessions to be granted to Czechoslovakia and the United Kingdom are withheld from Germany) will strengthen Germany's feeling of encirclement and will give this feeling more basis in fact. One of the most important objectives of our program is to relieve such pressures—not, so far as it lies within our power—to increase them.

(b) Finally it must be recognized that the continued development of autarchy in Germany will make a return to more liberal commercial policies more and more difficult.

In previous discussions of the question of whether this Government should seek a basis for some form of commercial agreement with Germany, we have been inclined, I feel, to place too much emphasis upon the possible effects of such an agreement upon Germany and the general European situation, and too little upon the actual gains which we might achieve for our trade thereby. The magnitude of the decline which our trade with Germany has suffered is an indication of the prize that is at stake. Not all of the lost trade, of course, could be won back; some part may be permanently gone, either to new domestic industries in Germany or to other foreign sources of supply. But given the reestablishment of a favorable basis for trade between the two countries, much undoubtedly could be recovered. And to the extent that the trade which has supplanted American goods in the German market is a hothouse development, it may be expected in turn to be supplanted by, and to die out before, an expanding volume of healthy trade. The following figures, taken from German statistics, are striking evidence of the magnitude of our loss:

German imports of all commodities

[In thousands of reichsmarks]

	Total	From United States	Percent from United States
1931-33 average	5,199,063	622,004	11.96

In the face of such a stupendous loss of trade, may we not, having the authority conferred by the Trade Agreements Act at our disposal and being entrusted with the responsibility of using that authority, be avoiding our duty and failing in our trust when we not only do not make to Germany proposals of our own, but decline even to investigate and encourage Germany's overtures to us?

These considerations lead me to the view that what is clearly not wanted at the present juncture is a continuance of rhetorical argument between the two Governments as to which is the more devoted to the most-favored-nation principle or which discriminates against the other country's trade. What is needed now is a definite decision on the part of this Government whether it prefers, in view of the many attendant difficulties and uncertainties, to allow trade between the two countries to continue in its present state and probably to decline still further, or whether it is willing to explore, in informal interchanges with the German Government, the possibility of reaching some agreement that would bring improvement.

An agreement with Germany, making possible large increases in exports, particularly of a number of staple agricultural products, would not be difficult to formulate and might prove considerably easier to negotiate than we have any idea of.

It is admittedly out of the question that any agreement could be devised that would provide American trade at once with full equality of treatment in the German market. The gap between the treatment American trade now enjoys and the minimum which this Government could consider full equality of treatment is too great to be bridged at one jump. In these circumstances the United States is confronted with the choice of regaining equality of treatment and of restoring its lost trade in two (or three) stages, which implies accepting less than full equality in the first or interim stage, or of continuing to maintain the position that it must have all or nothing and in fact get nothing.

An interim agreement should of course contain full assurances that the commercial relations between the two countries are to be governed in principle by the rule of equality of treatment applied to all forms of control of trade and of payments therefor, while the treatment of American trade by Germany for which it provides in fact should represent a substantial approach to equal treatment in this unrestricted sense and hence constitute a substantial improvement over present treatment.

In very brief outline such an agreement might be envisaged as follows:

The agreement would be concluded under the authority of the Trade Agreements Act and would comprise two schedules and general provisions according to the usual pattern of this country's trade agreements.

Schedule 1 would contain a list of duty concessions and a second list, probably longer than the first, of products on which Germany would agree to issue import permits up to a specific amount for each. Schedule 11 would contain duty concessions granted by the United States to Germany. (A study made some months ago on the basis of 1934 figures showed Germany to be the first supplier of 709 items, and the first, second, and third supplier of 1,536. Of the 709 items, 634 were dutiable, 506 at rates over 25 percent ad valorem.)

In the general provisions the United States and Germany would guarantee to each other unconditional most-favored-nation treatment in respect of customs duties and related matters. The usual article on monopolies and the recently adopted provision on exchange control, as well as the minor articles of our standard provisions, would also be included.

As regards quantitative restrictions the United States would obtain full equality of treatment on a vast majority of the products of which it is normally a major supplier to Germany. On a certain limited number of the more important products, however, the quotas allotted to the United States in the interim period would fall considerably short of providing full equality of treatment on the basis of the representative period formula but in each case they would represent a large increase over Germany's present imports of the goods in question from the United States.

It is recognized that the first reaction of many will be that any commercial agreement with Germany would be bad domestic politics in that certain groups would oppose it bitterly while the general public would show for it little enthusiasm. Such an agreement might be expected for a period to cause the administration embarrassment, and to reflect adversely upon the trade-agreements program. This situation might, however, be short-lived. Certainly the best politics of all, at any time, is the politics of prosperity. An agreement with Germany, if at all comprehensive, could hold promise of greater gains for American exports, and particularly American agricultural exports, than an agreement with any other country. If an agreement were concluded following next autumn's elections, a year and a half would still remain before the expiration of the Trade Agreements Act, and 2 years before the Presidential elections, in which its beneficial effects could be influencing and softening public opinion.

In the contribution which it would make toward the cause of peace a commercial agreement with Germany would merit, and might well receive, much approval by the American people. It is true that the argument has sometimes been advanced that such an agreement would tend to increase Germany's aggressiveness, and aid her to carry out her armament program and ultimately to wage war. If this is true, then the basic philosophy of the trade-agreements program is wrong. Would it not be more reasonable to expect that an agreement between Germany and the United States would be a factor making for peace? It would facilitate Germany's acquisition of raw materials; it would assist its export industries; it would be a proof to the German people that the democratic nations are not opposed to Germany's welfare, and it would rob the 4-year plan's drive toward increased autarchy of some of its raison d'être.

RECOMMENDATION

It is recommended that we investigate what the German Government may have to offer, and if that Government seems inclined to make a sincere effort to meet our point of view, that we work out the details of an interim agreement (perhaps along the lines suggested above) with the thought in mind of making public announcement of our intention to negotiate after next autumn's elections.

As a first step in this direction I believe that we should make a reply to the German Government's aide-memoire in friendly terms. We should avoid in it any formal restatement of our commercial policies and principles which the German Government has already been instructed in ad nauseam. We should also avoid making it a refutation of statements in the aide-memoire, or a further argumentation of our views and position. If we are ever to mend our commercial relations with Germany, we must adopt a more sympathetic attitude than that. We are playing a part that is unduly severe if we wait for all of the initiative to be supplied by the party which is in the weaker situation and for all constructive suggestions to come from the one least in a position to make them.

Instead, we should refer to the conciliatory passages in the aide-memoire and particularly to the German Government's reference to the possibility of an interim solution, and should state simply, that we regret the present state of the commercial relations between the two countries, that we are not unwilling to cooperate with Germany in seeking an interim solution and that, if the German Government should care to renew its suggestions of 1936, with certain modifications, we would give them sympathetic consideration.

A suggested reply to the German Government along these lines is attached hereto.

Now, Mr. Speaker, here is the so-called Stilwell letter, which reveals that the Chinese Government was not prepared to meet an assault by the Japs, and that the Communists there were the only ones who had an organized plan against such an attack.

It says:

[Hankow, Dated January 11, 1938. Received 8:20 p. m., 12th]

SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington.

24, January 11, 3 p. m. (Gray).

Following for War Department from Colonel Stilwell:

(End Gray.) "Since the capture of Nanking the front has melted away, fighting has practically ceased except on the Tsinpu line, and the military chiefs have been at a loss for a plan of action. The Chinese realize that they cannot compete in a stand-up fight. The Japanese realize that they are extended dangerously and they can see an apparent target to strike at that will give them a decision. Both sides are in a quandary, the Japanese hoping the Chinese will ask for peace, the Chinese hoping for intervention by a third power but determined not to quit.

(Gray). On the Chinese side only the Reds have a definite plan, the essence of which is the adoption of guerrilla warfare on a wide scale and the mobilization of the masses. This program has a strong appeal and has gained popular backing. (End Gray.) The Kuomintang leaders have been forced to take notice, since they can suggest nothing better, but they are not pushing the program in a wholehearted way, because its success will mean the passing of power to the Reds. And perfect support by the Government has therefore been extremely meager to date. (Gray.) Present indications are that this policy will be adopted and that there will be little further serious effort to oppose the Japanese with a field army. The question is, can it succeed? Guerrilla warfare means to conclude action by small units scattered over wide areas. Control is extremely difficult and without some moral force which urges on the individual concerted action is unlikely. This new force has elsewhere been supplied by religious fervor or patriotic zeal. In China the religious element is lacking and patriotic fervor is as yet largely undeveloped, though growing steadily. It is hard to arouse the spirit of self-sacrifice in people who have been treated as badly by their own troops as they have by the enemy. (End Gray.) However, the Chinese have been swept into mass action by propaganda in the past and the Reds claim that their plan will do it now. (Gray.) To supply this patriotic urge to self-sacrifice which is essential for success they are depending on the student type of agitation to arouse the people. In regions where Chinese troops have committed excesses results will be disappointing. In others where only the heavy hand of the Japanese have been felt, there may be more response. The question of arming the volunteers is, however, a serious matter; arms by the million are not available. The time factor is also important and it is doubtful whether this can be done short of 6 months by the Chinese. Based on the facts at present apparent the resort to guerrilla warfare by the Chinese cannot be expected to be adopted with enthusiasm by the Chinese as a whole and cannot have much more effect than to harass an enemy who will still be able to keep a firm hold on the occupied territory.

Twenty-four light Japanese bombers with eight pursuits flew in at 5,000 feet from the east about noon today and bombed Hankow airfield heavily. Little damage. Weather overcast and hazy. Antiaircraft fire ineffective. No Chinese airplanes in the air. No Japanese losses. Formation: groups of three in wedge with pursuit all on right (north) flank. Airplanes turned and flew off to northeast.

Query. Does War Department desire further report direct movements of personnel to military attaché's office in China, or will military attaché be free to make changes that may seem desirable? (End Gray.)

March 28. United States consul at Tampico, Mexico, in a cable describing the oil industry situation stated that a Japanese tanker was expected at Tuxpan the morning of March 29.

[Rome, 77, March 29, noon]

My 69, March 20, noon.

The Embassy learns that in the course of the conversations between Ciano and the British Ambassador on March 26 the British requested assurances that at the end of the war all Italian volunteers should leave Spanish territory and that all Italian war material would be withdrawn. These assurances were given the following day but the Italian Government has reserved the right to sell or to give certain quantities of war materials to the Franco government when they are no longer needed by the Italian forces in Spain.

The Ambassador also requested that some official Italian recognition be given to those passages in Chamberlain's recent speech which referred to the satisfactory progress of the negotiations with Italy. This was likewise agreed and the Informazione Diplomatica communiqué quoted in the Embassy's telegram No. 76, March 28, 6 p. m., was issued. The British Ambassador adds, however, that he had no prior knowledge of last paragraph containing the warning against French intervention.

Assurances were also given by the Italian Government that it would start almost immediately to withdraw troops from Libya at the rate of a thousand a week until the normal peace strength or about one-half the present garrison has been reached.

Several other minor points to be clarified but it is believed that only outstanding major question to be resolved relates to the form and publicity of the agreement. It has been agreed that it will take the form of a general protocol with separate instruments covering the various points included in the conversations to enter into force at a date to be set by the two Governments. This would permit the British to determine what progress had been made in Spain and the Italians to await recognition by Great Britain. The Italian Government is, however, anxious to make public the terms before Hitler's visit and is insisting upon some form of public pledge on the part of Great Britain with respect to the recognition of the Empire.

It is not yet known whether the British Government will be willing to make such a public pledge before the League Council meeting.

It has, however, been proposed that there be a public exchange of letters between the British Ambassador and the Italian Foreign Minister setting forth the undertaking on the part of the British Government to go to Geneva with a view to ultimate recognition of the Empire and the reaffirmation of Italian commitments with respect to Spain. The Ambassador is seeking instructions on this point and believes that the negotiations may be speedily concluded if his government is willing to accept this proposal.

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF THE ESTABLISHMENT OF THE MANCHUKUO HEAVY INDUSTRIES DEVELOPMENT CO.

The information supplied the Department by Consul Richard F. Boyce in his report entitled "New Economic Organization in 'Manchukuo,' " Yokohama, January 6, 1938, suggests an interpretation of the significance of the establishment in Manchuria of a new company to develop heavy industries which differs considerably from those popularly accepted. The facts in connection with the new company are as follows:

The Nippon Sangyo (Nihon Sangyo Kabushiki Kaisha) is a Japanese holding company capitalized at yen 225,000,000, headed by Gisuke Aikawa, which controls and manages a large network of industrial and commercial enterprises in Japan engaged in mining, shipbuilding, shipping, fishing, the manufacture of iron, automobiles, chemicals and oils, marine products, matches, and electric power.

The South Manchuria Railway Co. is a Japanese corporation owning and operating directly, or controlling through stock ownership, the enterprises occupying a key position in the economic life of Manchuria.

A new "Manchukuo" corporation, called the Manchukuo Heavy Industries Development Co., has been created, with a capitalization of yen 450,000,000, which will acquire the assets of the Nippon Sangyo and at the same time acquire from the South Manchuria Railway Co. control and management of many important mining and manufacturing enterprises (coal, iron, and gold mining, the iron and steel industry, light metal manufacture, automobile, aircraft, and other manufacturing industries). Half of the stock of the new company will be held by the present owners of Nippon Sangyo, and half will be held by the "Manchukuo" Government. Mr. Aikawa will assume management of the combined enterprises controlled by the new company.

The establishment of the new company has been generally portrayed as the opening up of Manchuria to private capital, with emphasis upon foreign capital, as the result of the failure of the South Manchuria Railway Co. to develop the country sufficiently, and its inability to attract capital for further expansion schemes.

It may be said with a fair degree of certainty that the establishment of the new company does not imply any material change in the opportunities for private capital in Manchuria. Private Japanese capital has always been allowed to participate in the minority shares of most of the enterprises controlled by the South Manchuria Railway Co. or the Manchukuo Government and foreign capital has been allowed in many. It is important to note that the supervising law governing the new company specifies that control of the new company, even as regards the details of business and financial management, shall rest with the Manchukuo Government (which also will own 50 percent of the stock of the new company). Most of the Manchurian enterprises slated to be controlled and managed by the new company are Manchukuo special companies already legally controlled by the state with the South Manchuria Railway Co. owning controlling stock of all of them. These distinctions are nice but irrelevant, since the Japanese Kwantung Army controls and is practically synonymous with the Manchukuo Government and the South Manchuria Railway Co. Control of the Manchurian enterprises involved, therefore, will remain centralized in the same hands. Private investors will be allowed to invest in the minority shares of the subsidiaries of the new company as they were allowed previously to invest in the minority shares of companies controlled by the South Manchuria Railway Co.

Not only does private capital make no gain as a result of the creation of the new company; on the contrary, the state of Manchukuo (or the army) acquires control of Nippon Sangyo's large network of industrial enterprises in Japan. It will be possible under the new set-up to operate these in coordination with the Manchurian enterprises. It is difficult to evaluate the relative importance of this factor in the creation of the new company. It may have been the principal reason for the change or it may have been a secondary reason. It can scarcely have been an incidental fact, however, that the army acquired as a result of the deal control of large industrial enterprises in Japan, particularly in view of the world-wide trend toward increased military influence in industry.

Is it likely that Mr. Sikawa's modern and thus far very successful business methods and reputation will attract private capital more successfully than the South Manchuria Railway Co.?

There is little doubt that Japanese investors are exhibiting an extreme lack of confidence in the South Manchuria Railway Co. In 1936 the company launched grandiose expansion plans, sponsored by the military, calling for an investment of yen 436,000,000 in 5 years in strategic and other primarily military enterprises. According to a report received from the American consul in Dairen, in March of 1937, it appeared that the company was borrowing in order to pay its dividends; at the same time the Japanese Government refused to pay up capital stock previously subscribed. The South Manchuria Railway Co. debentures were unsalable to the public and the newly adopted policy of selling to the public some of its shares in subsidiary companies had met with relatively little success.

The essence of the lack of confidence appears to lie in military domination of the business management of the South Manchuria Railway Co. and the vast expansion of enterprise since 1931 along strategic and military rather than economic lines. The soundness of extensive heavy industries in Manchuria may be questioned at once upon economic grounds. It is highly doubtful, therefore, that the transfer to new management (control remaining the same) of the heavy industries requiring extension in Manchuria will attract private capital, either Japanese or foreign, in substantial quantities. Nevertheless the Nippon Sangyo and its subsidiaries in Japan probably possess reserves and borrowing power which may be milked for the benefit of the Manchurian enterprises. Furthermore, the creation of the new company, with half the stock, taken by the Government of Manchukuo automatically pumps another yen 225,000,000 of public funds into Manchurian industry. It is true, these funds will be used by the new company to acquire from the South Manchuria Railway Co. control of the Manchurian enterprises to be taken over by the new company and leave little capital for expansion, but, since the South Manchuria Railway Co. and the new company are two pockets in the same military trousers, this need not detain us. The South Manchuria Railway Co. after having been paid off (probably) in Manchukuo bonds, will possess as a result of the deal additional resources with which to expand in Manchuria or in North China. (According to recent press reports the South Manchuria Railway Co. has definitely been alloted the task of developing the railways, rounds (roads?), harbors, and mines of North China.) It may be that this was one of the more important considerations of the deal.

Why should Mr. Aikawa be willing to merge his interests, and those of his coinvestors in Nippon Sangyo, with those of the somewhat more dubious economic enterprises of the South Manchuria Railway Co? The character and background of Mr. Aikawa fit admirably into the new picture. He is the son-in-law of Mr. Kuhara, president of the Japan Iron Foundries and a former Cabinet Minister. Mr. Kuhara has been associated with Mr. Aikawa in many of his most important enterprises and has supplied much of his capital. Moreover, he is closely associated with the more reactionary element in the Japanese Army and was recently sentenced to prison for his connection with the attempted army coup of February 26, 1936. Messrs. Aikawa and Kuhara have been favored by substantial Army support for the last few years and several of the more important industries controlled by Nippon Sangyo depend largely upon military orders. There certainly appears to be a sufficient amount of affinity and interdependence involved to explain Mr. Aikawa's action in the matter.

Mr. Aikawa now seeks to obtain American capital to aid in the expansion schemes of this large holding company controlled legally by the Manchukuo Government and in fact by the Japanese Kwantung Army and conducting enterprises both in Manchuria and Japan. It is reported that Mr. Aikawa will come shortly to the United States for the purpose of eliciting aid in the form of credits for machinery, equipment, and materials, for which he will exchange minority interest shares in the subsidiary companies of the Manchuria Heavy Industries Development Co. (in no case will foreigners be allowed majority interest or management privileges in any subsidiary).

Consul Boyce believes that Americans who may be approached by Mr. Aikawa should keep in mind the uneconomic nature of many of the enterprises controlled by the company, the Army control, the almost inevitable financial difficulties of Japan in the next few years, the possibility of war with Russia, and other considerations which he lists.

Here is a highly interesting report regarding a strictly secret Japanese armament program, which I hope every Member of the House will read.

It says:

AMERICAN CONSULATE,
Yokohama, Japan, January 6, 1938.

Subject: Enclosing a Report on the New Economic Organization in Manchukuo.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose herewith a report dated January 6, 1938, entitled "New Economic Organization in Manchukuo." This report describes the change in the directing force of the economic development of Manchukuo from the South Manchuria Railway to a new company, the Manchukuo Heavy Industry Development Co., which will be a holding company jointly owned by the Manchukuo Government and the Japan Industries Co. (Nihon Sangyo Kabushiki Kaisha).

Mr. Yoskisuke Aikawa, the promoter of the venture described in the report, is expected to leave Japan for the United States in a few days. He will no doubt present his plan for investment with American capital in Manchukuo to possible American investors as soon as he can arrange to meet them.

Respectfully yours,

RICHARD F. BOYCE,
American Consul.

NEW ECONOMIC ORGANIZATION OF MANCHUKUO

From Consul Richard F. Boyce, American consulate, Yokohama, Japan.

Date of completion: January 6, 1938.

Date of mailing: January 7, 1938.

NOTE.—The enclosure, Japan's Capital Resources, was prepared by Vice Consul Ivan B. White.

I. NEED FOR NEW POLICY IN ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT OF MANCHUKUO

Manchukuo's economic organization is principally agricultural—90 percent of the population is engaged in agriculture and 80 percent of the national income is derived from it.

The great importance of trade relations between Japan, Manchukuo, and China will be understood when one considers the poor natural wealth of Japan and the existence of abundant resources and wide consumption markets in Manchukuo and China. (Mitsubishi—Japan Trade and Industry, p. 623.)

The purpose of Japanese economic expansion into Manchukuo is said to be "to bring the two countries into a common economic unit, to avoid destructive competition, and to utilize as fully as possible the natural resources of the two countries." Japan-Manchukuo Year Book 1937, p. 840.)

"The South Manchuria Railway Co. has been the bulwark of Japanese political and economic interests in Manchuria for the past three decades." Since 1932 the company has had supervisory control either directly or indirectly through subsidiaries over many activities, including railways, workshops, steamships, harbors, coal mines, shale-oil plants, iron and steel works, chemical-fertilizer plants, electricity, gas, hotels, public works, such as schools, hospitals, etc.; slaughterhouses, cement, paraffin refinings, ceramics, industrial fats and oils, lumber, storage, express service, gold and lead mining, real estate, insurance, newspapers, etc.

The vast undertakings of the South Manchuria Railway Co., which is controlled by the Japanese Government, have not been developed, or have not developed Manchukuo, to the extent desired. The theory upon which the South Manchuria Railway Co. worked is said to have been evolved by the Japanese military authorities in "Manchukuo" and was based on the idea that the established capitalists of Japan, such as Mitsubishi, etc., should be kept out of "Manchukuo"; that the Government should run the entire project through the South Manchuria Railway Co. and any profits would accrue to the Government.

Without giving specific data to show how far short of the original expectations the South Manchuria Railway Co. development progressed, it is now announced that a change must be made and that capitalists will be given a chance to see what they can do.

II. OUTLINE OF NEW PLAN

(Supplied by Nihon Sangyo Kabushiki Kaisha)

Manchukuo Heavy Industries Co., Ltd.

The urgent necessity of expediting the development of industry in Manchukuo, more especially the heavy industries, leaves no room for discussion. To bring about this development and to take advantage of the forthcoming abolition of extraterritoriality rights which will result in the transfer of administrative power now exercised by the South Manchurian Railway in the railway zone, our company has come to an agreement whereby it will become a Manchukuo corporation and will move its head office to Hsinking.

This new Manchukuo corporation shall then merge with a powerful national policy corporation planned by the Manchukuo Government for the purpose of developing industries there on an integrated management principle, with the center in the heavy industries field. In addition to managing the existing enterprises of our present company, the new company resulting from the merger will undertake the important mission of controlling and managing the iron and steel industry, light metal manufacturing, automobile, aircraft, and other manufacturing industries in Manchukuo, also coal, gold, and other mining industries.

The new national policy corporation shall have a capital of yen 450,000,000 consisting of yen 225,000,000 to be invested by the Manchukuo Government, and the present capital of yen 225,000,000 of our company. The new corporation shall enjoy the positive support of both the Japanese and Manchukuo Governments with respect to the active utilization of the assets to be taken over from our company and of raising the necessary funds and making available other facilities that may be necessary.

The following is a general outline of definite terms agreed upon with a view to respecting the interests of the existing shareholders of our company and to provide for the investment of private capital in Manchukuo:

1. At the disposal of profit for each period, the dividend will be determined as follows:

(a) When the dividend rate for private shareholders is 10 percent or under, the dividend for the shares held by Manchukuo shall be one-half thereof. For example, if the private shareholders receive a 10-percent dividend, Manchukuo shall receive a 5-percent dividend.

(b) Any profit in excess of a dividend of 10 percent for private shareholders and 5 percent for Manchukuo shall be divided equally. For example, if private shareholders receive a 12-percent dividend, Manchukuo shall receive a 7-percent dividend.

2. In the event of liquidation of the corporation, the residue shall be divided between the private shareholders and the Government shares at the ratio of 2 to 1 up to 1½ of the paid-in capital. Any excess over 1½ shall be divided equally.

NOTE.—The new holding company will be called Manchukuo Heavy Industry Development Co.

3. The Manchukuo Government shall guarantee the principal and a net return of 6 percent per annum on all funds expended by the corporation in connection with carrying on enterprises in Manchukuo for 10 years. In the event the corporation does not earn 6 percent per annum and it is necessary for the Manchukuo Government to make up a deficit up to 6 percent, the Government shall be reimbursed in subsequent periods out of any earnings in excess of 6 percent until such time as the advance to cover the guaranteed dividend has been repaid.

4. There shall be no Manchukuo tax on profit made by the corporation from investments outside Manchukuo. Also dividends, paid by the corporation to shareholders residing outside of Manchukuo shall not be taxed. As to taxation in respect to enterprises in Manchukuo, the Manchukuo Government shall take suitable steps so as not to impair the functions of integrated management of the corporation in the event a change in the taxation system would, in the future, cause an additional burden to the corporation.

5. The corporation shall not be restricted as to the dividend rate in the disposal of profits.

6. In regard to the marketability of the private shares of the corporation, the Japanese and the Manchukuo Governments shall take suitable measures so that the existing negotiability shall not be impaired.

7. No restrictions will be placed on export of dividends.

The following table is said to be the list of companies which will come under the management of the new concern. (Japan-Manchukuo Year Book 1938, p. 948.)

Companies	Capital authorized	(Yen 1,000) paid-up
Showa Steel Works	100,000	82,000
Manchou Colliery	16,000	16,000
Manchuria Mining Development	5,000	3,100

The Manchukuo Government is furthermore expected to entrust the larger part of the work appertaining to the so-called Manchukuo 5-year industrial plan, which is scheduled to be undertaken with a budget of 3,000,000,000 yen, to the new company.

Controlling Legislation

The law passed by the Manchukuo Government to provide for the new regime is summarized as follows: (Japan Advertiser, December 30, 1937).

"HSINKING, December 20.—The Manchukuo Government promulgated today the Supervising Law of the Manchuria Heavy Industry Development Co., effective December 27.

"Under the supervision of the Manchukuo Government, the new company will undertake to develop the heavy industries of Manchukuo and at the same time promote the economic ties between the new state and Japan.

"The law consists of 31 articles, the salient feature of which is that the Government will give high protection to the company's interests and rights, while the state's control will be considerably enhanced.

"Scope Outlined

"Gist of the law follows:

"1. The Manchukuo Heavy Industry Development Co. will invest in steel manufacturing, light metal industries, mining, motorcar and aircraft manufacturing, and coal mining and will manage these branches of industry. It also will be empowered to invest in gold, zinc, lead, and copper mining.

"2. The company will be required to establish its main office in Hsinking.

"3. The company's board of directors will be composed of a president, two vice presidents, five or more directors, and three or more inspectors. The president and vice presidents will remain in office 5 years. They will be appointed by the Hsinking Govment, while the directors and inspectors will be elected.

"4. The company will be capitalized at yen 450,000,000. When necessary the company may obtain permission from the state minister concerned to increase its capitalization.

"5. State control will be increased along the following lines:

"(a) The right to appoint and fix the salaries and allowances for the president and vice presidents will be vested in the Manchukuo Government.

"(b) The company is under obligation to submit to the Hsinking Government a detailed report on the business program for each fiscal year.

"(c) Election of directors and inspectors, their dismissal, modification of the articles of association, disposal of profits, flotation of bonds, and other important matters are to be carried out under special permission of the state minister concerned.

"(d) The state minister concerned is empowered to issue any order considered necessary in connection with the business management of the company in case such is deemed necessary with regard to its supervision and control."

Officers of Company

The officers of the new company will be: Chairman and president, Yoshisuke Aikawa; directors: K. Shimokobe, T. Shimamoto, E. Tanaka, K. Yamada, Baron B. Ito, K. Tamura, G. Asahara, N. Odaira, S. Ibuki; auditors: C. Iwata, Y. Katayama, K. Yamada.

Now this document, Mr. Speaker, goes on to give the background of the head of this scheme.

Note what it says:

III. BACKGROUND OF YOSHISUKE AIKAWA AND THE NIHON SANGYO KABUSHIKI KAISHA

Yoshisuke Aikawa

The decision of the Japanese Government, said to be controlled in this matter by the military party in Japan, to invite capitalists to take over the industrial development of Manchukuo was iollowed by their selection of Mr. Yoshisuke Aikawa and the Nihon Sangyo Kabushiki Kaisha, of which he is president, as the sole agent for carrying out the new scheme into effect. The change amounts to substituting Mr. Aikawa and his company for Mr. Yosuke Matsuoka and the South Manchuria Railway, of which he is president.

Mr. Yoshisuke Aikawa was born in Yamaguchi Prefecture, Japan, in November 1880. He graduated from the Engineering College of Tokyo Imperial University in 1903. He is described as "a scion of a good family" in Yamaguchi Prefecture. His father was a prefectural government official. Desiring to learn about the metal industry from the ground up he worked as a laborer in the iron foundry in Shibaura for 2 years after his graduation. He worked for 2 years as a laborer in a foundry in the United States. Upon his return to Japan in 1909 he founded the Tobata Casting Co., with capital provided by Mitsui, Kuhara, Kaijima, and Fukita interests. He was helped greatly by his uncle, Marquis Kaoru Inouye, "a statesman of the Meiji Restoration," who took a keen interest in him. He has for some years been closely associated with his father-in-law, Kusanosuke Kuhara, president of the Japan Iron Foundries, who was one of his original backers in the Tobata venture, who has supplied much of Aikawa's capital. Kuhara became closely associated with the reactionary elements in the Japanese Army and was recently sentenced to prison for his connection with the now famous attempt of those officers on February 26, 1936, to seize the control of the Government.

Mr. Aikawa and Mr. Kuhara have, according to all accounts, been favored by substantial army support for the last few years and the present development is a culmination of their relations with the army. Mr. Kuhara's connection with the attempted army coup d'état which resulted in his imprisonment has presumably improved his political support by the army.

The army is said to be opposed to the old financial interests, such as Mitsui, Mitsubishi, Sumitomo, etc., etc., because their prosperity benefits only a few families already wealthy. The army favors Aikawa and his interests because their prosperity benefits an alleged 5,000,000 shareholders all over Japan in addition to the 130,000 employees.

It seems clear that the prosperity of the new company will continue to depend largely upon the support of the army and upon war expenditures.

Mr. Aikawa publicly and privately admires American business and industrial methods. His experience in the United States is said to have aroused this admiration and it is inferred that he is genuinely friendly to Americans. The American engineers who have worked for him all speak of him in the highest terms so far as their business and personal relations are concerned. They also speak highly of his ability.

Nihon Sangyo Kabushiki Kaisha

A great deal has been written about the Nihon Sangyo Kabushiki Kaisha during the past few years, mostly inspired articles intended to promote the sale of shares of the company and to promote the sale of the product of the subsidiary companies. The following information is taken from a series of articles in the Japan Advertiser of January 16, 17, 18, 1936, and from other sources:

Mr. Aikawa and the Nihon Sangyo Kabushiki Kaisha were relatively unknown prior to 1931, but his remarkable progress since then has aroused universal attention. The Aikawa-kuhara interests were built upon the success of the Japan Mining Co., which has been their largest subsidiary and a most profitable one. It is said to be the largest gold-mining company in Japan and also produces silver, lead, copper, and other mineral products. In recent years it has paid as much as 14 percent dividends on its capitalization of yen 89,127,000.

The second and third subsidiaries are the Hitachi Engineering Works and the Hitachi Electric Power Co. These depend largely on military orders. The profit of the engineering company in the first half of 1935 was claimed to be 37.8 percent on its capitalization of yen 20,000,000 and a 12-percent dividend was declared.

The growth of the Nihon Sangyo Kabushiki Kaisha has been so rapid since 1931 that in 1936 it controlled nearly 50 subsidiaries and was said to be promoting new subsidiaries at the rate of 2 a month. It was interested mainly in mining, manufacturing, marine products, and miscellaneous. There follows a list of the main subsidiaries as supplied by the company on December 8, 1937.

Since that list was given it has just been announced that the Nipponophone and Victor companies have been sold to the Tokyo Denki Kabushiki Kaisha (with which the General Electric Co. of Schenectady, N. Y., has a working agreement). These two companies were purchased by the Nihon Sangyo Kabushiki Kaisha within the past 2 years at the time when they were doing a very profitable business. They control the phonograph market in Japan. Since the new import tariffs, sales taxes, and exchange restrictions were put into effect, however, it is said that the companies have had difficulty making ends meet.

There may be other sales of the Japan interests of the Nihon Sangyo Kabushiki Kaisha in order to raise funds for financing the venture in Manchukuo.

The Nissan Co. has been fully reported on. (See the confidential report of this office on June 12, 1936, Japanese Automotive Industry.) Its first product, the Datsun midget car, is said to be selling well in competition with Japanese three-wheeled motorcycle delivery vans, but it is doubtful whether the company is making an appreciable profit. Its second product, the Nissan standard-sized truck, is being produced at a rate of 20 units a day for the Army and is believed to be operating at a substantial loss.

Then, Mr. Speaker, the document goes on to show that American capital was counted on in this Jap scheme.

Here is what it says:

IV. ANALYSIS OF ECONOMIC FACTORS INVOLVED

The announced intention of the Nihon Sangyo Kabushiki Kaisha is to invite foreign capital to participate in the development of Manchukuo. Mr. Aikawa is said to be planning to visit the United States very shortly to obtain American capital. He will probably be accompanied by Mr. James W. Murray. Mr. Murray is an American citizen who came to Japan several years ago as treasurer of the Nipponophone Co. (Columbia Phonograph Co.) in Kawasaki. When the company was purchased by the Nihon Sangyo Kabushiki Kaisha in 1935, Mr. Murray was retained by the new owners and has since been acting in an advisory capacity to the company on financial matters particularly in its dealing with American companies in the United States. Mr. Murray will therefore assist Mr. Aikawa in completing any financial arrangements which Mr. Aikawa decides upon but will not engage in any of the promoting activities of Mr. Aikawa.

Mr. Aikawa needs money or credit totaling several million dollars. He wants it in the form of machine tools, factory equipment, foundry and steel-mill equipment, mining equipment, automotive equipment, and materials. He wants also the latest engineering advice and the assistance of American engineers to design the plants, purchase and install the equipment and get the new industries in running order.

He will pay well for what he buys but he wants all this on credit for at least 3 years and preferably for 10 years. His proposition is to exchange shares or debentures of the subsidiary companies for the materials, equipment, and engineering advice received. He does not want to issue debentures or make loans which mature in less than 10 years.

He will propose that all American dollar investments will be represented by shares or debentures in yen; that such yen values will be revalued whenever they are repurchased by the company so that the American investor will get the same dollar refund, regardless of any possible yen depreciation, as his original dollar investment.

The guaranty of such an arrangement will be made by the Manchukuo Government in the form of laws or regulations but not by treaties.

No American or other foreign investment will be permitted to own a controlling interest in any of the subsidiaries, and none of the foreign investment will be permitted in shares of the parent company.

Americans who may be approached by Mr. Aikawa should consider the matter very carefully before committing themselves. The following facts are given as bearing upon any plans he may suggest:

1. The purpose of Mr. Aikawa's invitation to American capitalists is to obtain funds or credit which are not readily available in Japan to carry out his plans in "Manchoukuo." A statement regarding Japan's capital resources, prepared by Vice Consul Ivan B. White, is enclosed herewith. The profit accruing to American investors is only incidental to his venture. He would not seek American capital if he could get sufficient capital in Japan.

2. The success of the venture in "Manchoukuo" depends upon (a) the economic possibilities of "Manchoukuo," (b) the economic situation in Japan itself, (c) the success of Japan in China, (d) the political support of the Japanese Army, (e) the continuation of heavy expenditures in Japan and "Manchoukuo" for munitions and other war purposes, and (f) Mr. Aikawa's ability.

3. There is a great difference of opinion as to what the economic possibilities of "Manchoukuo" are. It is an agricultural country, and the Japanese Government wishes to keep the market there for Japan's own industries and does not wish to establish industries that will compete with its own factories. It seems inconsistent, therefore, to establish a new automotive industry and a new aircraft industry, as announced by the company, unless it is being done purely for reasons of military defense against Russia. The present annual automotive market in "Manchoukuo" is only 2,500 units. The annual consumption of aircraft for civil purposes is very little. The principal industrial possibilities, from an economic point of view, appear to be the production of iron and coal as a source of supply to Japanese industries and for national defense.

This office is not supplied with sufficient data to report upon the economic possibilities of "Manchoukuo." This data should be available in the consulates in "Manchoukuo." There is doubt, however, as to whether the proposed development is more for economic reasons than for military defense.

4. As the "Manchoukuo" Government, which is a 50-percent owner of the new company and which guarantees the profits and other benefits to American investors, is the instrument of the Japanese Government, the success or failure of the new company will depend largely upon the success or failure of present economic developments in Japan. Practically every American or English economist or businessman with intimate knowledge of the country agrees in predicting serious economic trouble for the country within the next 3 years, whether Japan's military activities in China succeed or fail. As economic conditions in Japan become worse, Japan's ability to support "Manchoukuo" decreases and any guarantees as to profits to exemption of profits from taxation, to permission to export profits and dividends, become affected. The much-advertised "Japan-Manchoukuo bloc" is only as good as Japan can make it.

5. Japan's success in China depends upon many unknown and unpredictable factors. The present military activity is costing Japan a great amount of money and the desired economic expansion there will cost a great deal more. The Japanese businessmen are not believed to be too optimistic, but in any case it is admitted that failure of their economic expansion in China would be ruinous to Japan after the great sacrifices they are now making.

6. The Japanese admit that the prosperity of the heavy industries of the country since 1932 is largely due to military expenditures. This can easily be proved, and no attempt has been made to deny it. It is admitted that such expenditures cannot be supported indefinitely. It follows that when the expenditures stop either by reason of exhaustion or otherwise, the heavy industries will suffer a depression. As the activities of the new company in Manchukuo will be largely in heavy industries and as some of the leading activities of the Nihon Sangyo Kabushiki Kaisha in Japan proper, which are now taken over by the new company, are heavy industries, it is hard to see how the Manchukuo Heavy Industry Development Co. can fail to suffer when it loses the support of the war expenditures.

7. As the Japanese Army officials are so powerful politically and as their policies are subject to change without consideration of other interests, it is always possible for them to abandon Mr. Aikawa and his company just as abruptly as they dropped Mr. Matsuoka and the South Manchuria Railway.

8. The success of the venture also depends largely upon Mr. Aikawa's ability to manage the huge interests he has undertaken. Although he has been successful to date, his success has admittedly been due in large measure to conditions over which he has no control. It is one thing to expand successfully in boom times. It remains to be seen how he can do in a depression. Some, but not all, of his ventures have succeeded. Certainly his automotive ventures are not a success and without army support would have been abandoned.

9. The American investor can buy Japanese Government bonds in New York, payable in United States dollars, at such a discount that they yield him 10 percent. The investment in the new company has only a 6 percent guaranteed yield. The possibility of getting more than 6 percent is purely speculative.

10. The American investor cannot buy any shares of the Manchukuo Heavy Industry Development Co., but only of the subsidiary companies. The parent company could declare a substantial profit from sources not available to the American investor and the subsidiary might only declare a 6-percent dividend.

11. The American investor cannot control more than 49 percent of the stock of any subsidiary. If the subsidiary, for example, made automobiles, the American investor could not keep the company from exporting to markets in competition with his American plant. He could not be a decisive factor in any of the acts the directors decided upon. He could be frozen out at any time.

12. The economic set-up in Manchukuo is still a monopoly, the only change being from the South Manchuria Railway to the Manchukuo Heavy Industry Development Co. If the activities of any subsidiary in which an American might invest should run counter to the purpose of the controlling interests of the parent company, they would be curtailed even though it adversely affected the subsidiary.

13. As Japan has announced upon a number of occasions that the terms of treaties should not be binding upon her when the conditions existing at the time the treaties were made have changed, it is hard to believe that less formal guarantees, as represented by the laws of Manchukuo would be considered as binding her if economic conditions in Japan became so unfavorable as to make it difficult to carry them out. Up to now the Japanese Government has never defaulted on its bonds. It would not do so unless the economic situation became hopeless. The situation is becoming more and more serious, however, and it is too soon to say that Japan will never default. American experiences in Germany, Italy, Russia, Spain, and other countries and the experience of the foreign oil companies in Manchukuo should be considered in predicting possibilities of American participation in the new venture.

FEBRUARY 18, 1938.

German domination of Central Europe and Czechoslovak trade agreement.

Mr. Vladimir Hurban, Czechoslovak Minister, The Secretary, Mr. Sayre.

Mr. Hurban called on the Secretary by appointment in order to deliver to him a message just received from his Govenment. Mr. Hurban began by saying that the situation in Czechoslovakia is grave, very, very difficult. He went on to say that Germany is threatening to dominate central Europe economically as well as in other ways. He said that his Government believed that the German Government intends the complete domination of central Europe and that German activities seem to point to a plan of forming extensive clearing agreements with all the European countries of central Europe except Austria and Czechoslovakia. Within the limits of such an extensive clearing agreement would be Hungary, Yugoslavia, Bulgaria, Rumania, Greece, and other countries similarly situated. The economic effect of such a union would be extensive bartering without money passing on the basis presumably of the German mark. In the words of the Czechoslovak Minister, it would be equivalent to a large monetary union. He said that Austria and Czechoslovakia would be left out of this because of German plans to dominate these two countries through political means. From the entire group trade from the other countries would be virtually excluded. In other words, the plan was German domination of central Europe, with a closed door to the trade of every other country. The Czechoslovak Minister said that his Government had brought this matter to the attention of the British and French Governments within the last day or two and that he was now instructed to bring it to the attention of the United States Government.

In view of this development, the Czechoslovak Minister said that he hoped we would not be rigid in insisting upon the language in our trade agreement covering the Danubian preferences, for he said that some kind of a Danubian alliance seemed to be the only way successfully to prevent the achievement of such a German plan as he outlined.

GERMANY

March 26 Ravndal, United States consul at Buenos Aires, cabled: "According to best possible source, Germany is secretly purchasing large stocks of cereals and linseed in Argentina, presumably for excessive fees. Shipments since January 15, 1938, have been of unusual volume and local shippers are strictly prohibited from divulging any information regarding them."

My No. 29, February 11, noon.

I have been reliably informed that 412,000 gallons of kerosene have been imported duty-free at Tientsin under Japanese military auspices during February and that 354,000 gallons of duty-free kerosene were forwarded to Peiping by the Japanese Takas Petroleum Co. between January 1 and February 12 to be placed on the market there.

CALDWELL.

March 11. Gauss, United States consul at Shanghai, cabled that military observers estimated that over 70,000 reinforcements with considerable quantities of heavy artillery have landed at Woosung, during the past 2 weeks. Over 50 percent believed destined for southern Tsiupu front; the rest to be distributed between Wuhu, Hangchow, and along the lines of communication.

MEMORANDUM

The United States Government has devoted careful study to the aide memoire left by the German Ambassador with the Acting Secretary of State on October 21, 1937. While it cannot subscribe to a number of the contentions advanced by the German Government throughout the aide-memoire, it has noted with satisfaction the German Government's willingness, given certain conditions, "to adjust its trade policy to the principle of the free exchange of goods" and its assurance that "it is ready to accord to the United States the same favorable treatment that it does to any other country."

In particular, the United States Government has noted with deep gratification the German Government's renewed affirmation of its belief in, and adherence to, the unconditional most-favored-nation principle. As the German Government knows, the United States is convinced that the interests of world trade, and hence of the world's commercial nations, are best served by the application of the principle of equality of opportunity and treatment not only to tariff rates, but also to all other measures that may be adopted to control trade or payments therefor.

The United States Government keenly regrets that, although almost 2½ years have passed since the suspension of the most-favored-nation provisions of the Treaty of Friendship, Commerce and Consular Rights, it has not yet been possible to reestablish commercial relations between the two countries upon this basis. In its aide-memoire the German Government intimates that an interim solution might be found which might furnish a practical contribution to the realization of the desire of both countries to increase their exchange of goods. The United States notes that the German Government still considers the suggestions made informally by it in March and May 1936, as a basis for the negotiation of an agreement of this nature.

The United States is not unaware of the economic and financial difficulties with which Germany is confronted. Without commenting upon the German Government's analysis of the origin of these difficulties, it recognizes the limitations which they presently impose upon Germany's possibilities of action. In view of these circumstances the United States Government is ready to cooperate with the German Government in seeking some temporary, or interim, solution to their common problem, which would regularize German-American commercial relations pending their reestablishment upon a full most-favored-nation basis and at the same time facilitate and hasten the attainment of that end. Any plan designed to provide such a solution, in order to be acceptable to this Government, must be based upon an agreement that the commercial relations between Germany and the United States are to be governed in principle by the rule of equality of treatment, applied to all forms of control of commerce and of current commercial payments, and must provide that the treatment to be accorded in fact to American trade by Germany during the interim period shall represent a substantial approach to equal treatment in this unrestricted sense and hence constitute a substantial improvement over present treatment. The suggestions offered by the German Government in March and May 1936, while they may be construed as responding in general terms to the first of these conditions, fall short by a considerable margin of satisfying the second.

If the German Government should care to renew its suggestions, modified in the sense outlined above, this Government would be pleased to accord them sympathetic consideration.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON.
TA: Darlington: MPD.
December 31, 1937.

Then Mr. Speaker, the document which follows gives more details of the proposed trade agreement between Germany and the United States in 1937.

Listen to this:

[Handed to the German Ambassador by Mr. Welles, July 21, 1937]

AIDE-MEMOIRE

The German Ambassador on June 30, acting on instructions from his Government and referring to an invitation extended him by the Under Secretary of State to discuss with him the nature of the conversations which officials of the United States Government were carrying on in Washington with the Brazilian Ambassador and the Brazilian Minister of Finance, made oral representations to the Under Secretary raising the question whether these conversations did not involve unwarranted and unfair interference on the part of the United States in trade relations between Germany and Brazil. The Ambassador stated that Germany during recent years had been endeavoring to rebuild its exports to Brazil, which had fallen to low levels after the World War, and that it had only recently succeeded in doing so and in fact in somewhat exceeding its prewar percentage in Brazilian importations. This he said did not constitute a threat or jeopardy to American commercial interests in Brazil and the increased trade had not been derived at the expense of the United States. The Ambassador said that his Government was most heartily in accord with the principles maintained by the Government of the United States as to the necessity of unconditional most-favored-nation treatment and as to the need for the elimination of trade barriers, and that the autarchic policies now pursued by Germany were intended only to obtain for German exports the same advantages which had accrued to the exports of the United States and of other great commercial nations through the devaluation of their currencies. He concluded by saying that his Government reserved complete liberty of action to take such measures as it might find necessary in case activities of the Government of the United States should lead Brazil to limit its trade with Germany.

An oral reply was at once made to the Ambassador's representation. It is now desired to confirm and amplify this reply.

The Ambassador has said that the German Government is in hearty accord with the principles maintained by the Government of the United States as to the necessity for most-favored-nation treatment and the removal of trade barriers. The Government of the United States does indeed attach great importance to the principle of equality of treatment in international commerce as the most satisfactory basis upon which a healthy international trade can be reconstructed as a permanent foundation for peace.

The Government of the United States has been endeavoring to promote the restoration of international trade through the immediate reduction of excessive trade barriers and has adopted as the most practical means to this end a program of negotiating bilateral trade agreements with individual countries while extending to all countries which do not discriminate against its trade the benefit of the tariff reductions and other trade advantages it grants any country (Cuba always excepted). The United States has also urged on other countries, and especially on the great commercial countries which exercise a preponderant influence on the commercial policies of the world, the adoption and active execution of similar principles and policies, and the abandonment of policies and practices which conflict with and threaten to thwart the movement for restoration and liberalization of world trade.

Unlike the policy of countries which by clearing and compensation arrangements make access to their markets depend upon the obtaining from other countries of special terms of payment which require purchase of their exports, and do not therefore permit the full and ordinary action of international competition, the commercial policy of the United States imposes no such requirement on the export trade of other countries and involves no economic coercion. The United States seeks equality of commercial opportunity for its trade in other countries, subject to certain reasonable and recognized exceptions. It gives other countries equality of opportunity to buy and sell in the United States, subject only to the requirement that countries which receive nondiscriminatory treatment from the United States shall not discriminate against the United States, and to the historical and recognized exception in favor of Cuba. It is not a narrow policy of seeking advantage for the United States and it will in part have failed if it does not serve to promote a general increase in the volume and value of international trade from which the United States and the world will receive greater benefit than would be possible from any cumulation of special advantages under discriminatory trade regimes.

It must be manifest that such a policy is not motivated by hostility to or jealousy of the commercial expansion of any country nor does it seek unfair advantage over the trade of any country. The United States does not impute such motives to any country. It does believe, however, that certain types of commercial policies of other countries, for whatever reasons they may have been adopted, may tend to hamper and thwart its own more liberal policy and its broad objectives, and it feels fully warranted in discussing this problem with any government in whose territories it may arise and in seeking a mutually satisfactory solution.

The Government of the United States welcomes the German Government's repeated expression of approval of the principle of most-favored-nation treatment and of the removal of trade barriers. Certain aspects of current German commercial policy would appear to make more difficult the application of these principles rather than to advance them.

German trade with most of the countries of Europe and with some in other parts of the world is governed by compensation arrangements under which the proceeds of the sale in Germany of the products of the soil or industry of the other party are required to be spent, with limited exceptions, for German goods for export to and use in the territory of the other party. With some other countries the same result is brought about without a compensation arrangement by German regulations limiting the use of the proceeds of their exports—the system of compensation marks. Restrictions on the transfer and on the use in Germany of funds payable to nonresidents on indebtedness and other accounts not directly connected with current international trade have been used for the same purpose. It is argued that this is intended to obtain for German exports only the same advantages which other countries have obtained by devaluing their currencies. It is nonetheless clear that where the sale of the products of a country or the effective possession of property of its nationals can be attained only by the importation of German goods in corresponding value, equality of opportunity for exporters of other countries to compete wtih German exporters vanishes. With the refinements of practice devised by the German exchange control authorities for purposes of commercial policy, German compensation mark practices become in fact potent and effective weapons for obtaining advantages over competitors of non-German residence. The restrictions on the use of the bank deposits in Germany which are designated as compensation marks result in the transfer of such marks among residents of other countries at prices much lower than the official parity of the reichsmark with gold. The highest legal adviser of the United States Government, after careful consideration of procedures of this kind as used in German trade with the United States in 1936, ruled that they constituted the payment or bestowal of a bounty or grant calling for the imposition of countervailing duties under the laws of the United States.

Germany is not the only country fostering exports by compensation arrangements or by permitting its currency to be sold at depreciated prices to certain nonresidents for restricted uses, although it is outstanding among such countries. Its exports, however, receive one distinctive advantage, inconsistent with a regime of equal competition, through provision for massive but selective direct subsidies. In the form of voluntary self-aid, German industries subscribe annually to an export subsidy fund which is reputed to amount during the current year to 1,000,000,000 reichsmarks. This would permit a uniform subsidy on all German exports of more than 20 percent of their value. Naturally, however, the actual direct subsidization is selective and, while the facts are not officially published, it is understood that subsidies as high as 50 percent and even 60 percent of invoice value have in some instances been paid to enable German exporters to meet competition in foreign markets.

The effect of trade methods such as have been described appears to be manifest in shifts in trade too extensive to be ascribed to any normal change in competitive conditions. Thus Brazilian statistics show the following percentages of participation of Germany in supplying Brazilian imports:

1934: Germany, 14.02 percent; United States, 23.67 percent; others, 62.31 percent.

1935: Germany, 20.44 percent; United States, 23.36 percent; others, 56.20 percent.

1936: Germany, 23.50 percent; United States, 22.12 percent; others, 54.38 percent.

First quarter, 1937: Germany, 26.03 percent; United States, 21.02 percent; others, 52.95 percent.

The problem which such subsidizations present to the exporters of other countries, including those of the United States, must be appreciated. By the use of subsidy procedure every field of trade, no matter how reasonable the price of the commodity offered, no matter how well-established the business connection, may be disturbed by some administrative decision to subsidize a competing product sufficiently to disturb the business. Competition so directed seems to this Government to be contrary to the principle of equality to which the German Government declares itself to be attached. Furthermore, it takes the determination of trade movement out of the ordinary competitive circumstance and places it into the hands of Government officials whose calculations need not correspond to those of competitive cost. Against the possibility of competition open to such direction it would seem plain that competition of private business, dependent solely on itself, needs safeguarding. Without such safeguard both the principles embodied in the trade agreement between the United States and Brazil and the trade benefits to be expected therefrom are brought into jeopardy. In return for the trade opportunities granted to Brazil under the agreement, American trade was pledged corresponding opportunity. Trust was placed solely in the operations of those private business calculations which have built up Brazilian-American trade in the past, to extend that trade if tariff barriers were lessened. All these expectations would be invalidated if American trade were dispossessed as a result of the use of a system of compensation procedures and governmental subsidies. The German Government surely realizes the problems created by the use of these procedures; their continued effect would be to weaken any commercial treaty arrangements based on other principles unless safeguards were taken against them; and with the weakening of these commercial treaty arrangements the underlying principles themselves will become inoperative.

There is no basis for statements, or implications that the Government of the United States has been influencing the Brazilian Government in its trade relations with Germany by threats of coercion. A trade agreement based on the principle of most-favored-nation treatment was concluded between the United States and Brazil two and a half years ago and Brazil was the first American power to join the United States in its policy of reconstructing international trade on the basis of equality of treatment. Both governments are directing their efforts to assure that the principles underlying this agreement shall be sustained, and that the anticipated benefits be realized in their mutual trade relations.

This partially substantiates widespread but unconfirmed reports of activities of Chinese irregulars at Paoting and points along the railway south thereof.

it appears probable that the Admiralty will favor for this year's program raising the battleship limit to about 39,000 tons and making no change in cruiser limits. Captain Willson forwarded a full report by mail to the Navy Department in yesterday's pouch via Queen Mary.

My telegram No. 16, February 13.

Have just seen (? illegible word) Schmidt and he told me that the Berchtesgaden conversations had been extremely "hard" and that he had to admit that Schuschnigg has been under heavy pressure. I inquired whether Schuschnigg had been confronted as rumored with the text of an agreement already signed by Hitler. He denied this and stated that during the protracted conversations every possible combination had been debated. He admitted, however, that three ranking generals had been present in order to increase the pressure and did not deny a rumor that Hitler had threatened trouble in the event that Schuschnigg refused to accept Hitler's proposals. It had all, however, come to a happy end and he felt that a great service had been rendered to world peace. He would not promise that the solution would be a permanent one. Probably Austro-German relations would again come to a crisis and require revision.

I asked Schmidt whether an agreement had actually been definitely concluded. He replied that the agreement had not as yet been formally reached but that he thought it would be and that a joint communiqué would be issued. I inquired with regard to details. He told me that the agreement would comprise all of the basic elements of the July 11 accord and admitted that Hitler had requested the inclusion of Seyssinquart in the government as Minister of Public Security. Police President Skubl, however, would remain. Schmidt assured me that the Chancellor had complete confidence in Seyssinquart and that he, Schmidt, did not regard him as an obstacle to appeasement. He said that "if he is loyal we prefer to have Nazis arrested by a Nazi. If he is not loyal it will mean that appeasement between the two countries is not possible and something else will have to be done." I suggested that as late as 2 years ago Seyssinquart had been working actively on behalf of the Nazis. He replied that Seyssinquart was a devout Catholic and since that time the "Kultur Kampf" had broken out. Moreover, Seyssinquart was in deadly opposition to Captain Leopold, the illegal Austrian Nazi leader. I suggested that if Seyssinquart was loyal to Schuschnigg I did not understand why Hitler placed such emphasis on his inclusion in the government or if he was not loyal how the Austrian Government could risk turning over the police control of the country to him. Schmidt replied that he had raised the same question with Hitler. However there was always a "middle way" and he hoped that it would be found in the present instance. (I could not obtain clarification of this.)

I [apparent omission] Schmidt if it was true that Schuschnigg had shown Hitler documents seized in tavs affair incriminating Nazi leaders in Germany. He replied in the negative stating that this had previously been done through Papen. (Papen definitely leaves end of this week.)

Schmidt added that while it had been agreeable to work with Ribbentrop he had the definite feeling that Ribbentrop had inwardly been much opposed to the results achieved

I queried Schmidt with regard to the Italian attitude. He was noncommittal save for the admission the Italian Government was informed of the negotiations well in advance.

I told Schmidt that my Government maintained a deep and sincere interest in the welfare of Austria and I was sure it hoped earnestly that the Austrian Government would firmly resist threats against the independence of Austria.

I have learned indirectly but reliably from the Federal Press Service that in return for the appointment of Seyss-Inquart Hitler promised the maintenance of the principles the July 11 agreement with recognition of Austria's independence, may (?) the patriotic front as the unique political structure of Austria together with a pledge of noninterference in domestic affairs; economic matters were not mentioned.

Schuschnigg avoided committing himself, stating that he was not authorized to sign any agreement without previous consultation with President Miklas. According to the press service the attitude of the Chancelor was that the portfolio of public security which he now retains could only be confided to someone having his entire confidence. President Miklas was opposed to the proposed concession.

From another source reliably informed Hitler promised to dissolve Austrian legion in Germany. About a thousand workmen at Austro Fiat and Clayton Shuttleworth factories made a short protest strike this morning against concession to National Socialists.

My feeling is that inclusion of Seyss-Inquart in the Government would be stopgap solution reflecting force of German pressure and would profoundly discourage spirit of resistance in Austria.

Have just seen Minister for Foreign Affairs Schmidt, who seemed on the whole cheerful. He expressed confidence that a period of internal quiet would ensue but felt nevertheless that like the agreement of July 11 only temporary appeasement could be obtained. The task of Seyss-Inquart would be to bring into the fold those elements which have so far been irreconcilable. He did not know how this could be accomplished and foresaw that Seyss-Inquart would have difficulty with Nazi extremists. Probably several new councilors of state would be appointed but this had already been under deliberation with Seyss-Inquart for some time. I asked what further steps the Austrian Government would take in carrying out Berchtesgaden agreement. He replied that pensions would be given to ex-functionaries who were dismissed for Nazi activities. They would, however, not be reinstated. The amnesty did not apply to the Austrian legionnaires in Germany. He desired that someone be appointed in administrative capacity to look after Austro-German press matters under the two governments. This move he said had not been dictated by Hitler.

Schmidt said that present German maneuvers on the Austrian frontier had been planned for 2 months. He did not believe that they were a military demonstration against Austria.

Also saw the French Minister, who has interviewed Schuschnigg and Hornbostel, with both of whom he has unusually close relations. Paux told me that formation of cabinet was bitterly contested. Papen made a last minute effort to have Glaise Horstenau made Vice Chancelor and an outstanding Nazi appointed Minister of Justice.

(I am reliably informed that Bishop Gfoeliner, of Linz, rushed to Vienna despite illness and urged resistance upon President Miklas. In consequence, Catholic Church claims credit for saving these posts from Nazis.)

Schuschnigg informed the French Minister that in Berchtesgaden conversation Hitler boasted to him of military prowess of Germany, deprecated French military equipment, alleged that everything he did with respect to Austria and the Sudeten Germans was in entire agreement with Halifax (British Minister has telegraphed this to the Foreign Office), that in 2 years' time Italy would no longer mean anything to Germany and that it was holy mission to unite 80,000,000 Germans into a nation which would rule Europe.

In contrast with Schmidt the Chancelor frankly resents German maneuvers as military demonstration against Austria. Also article in today's National Zeitung, of Essen, that reconstruction of Austrian Cabinet is first step in Gleichschaltung.

French Minister believes immediate future unpredictable and hopes that there will be at least a temporary period of quiet. He remains, however, most pessimistic regarding the future of Austria and is apprehensive that present German success will encourage Hitler to undertake some new adventure within a few months which may precipitate European war. He stated that today the British Government had made representations at Berlin and that tomorrow the French Government would do likewise. He feared, however, that these representations were of a harmless informative nature not likely to serve as an effective deterrent.

I have also seen the Italian Minister who assumes the attitude that nothing unusual is going on and that Austrian independence is not menaced. Mussolini sent message last night approving proposed cabinet reorganization.

A prominent Austrian banker who is exceptionally well informed described the situation as most favorable possible outcome for Austria. Austria was threatened with radical action by Germany which could not be resisted. Present compromise would prove far less successful for German aims than Hitler expected. Seyss-Inquart was fundamentally weak and vacillating and would be outmaneuvered by Schuschnigg and Skubl, the Secretary of State for Public Security. He was sure that Austria had gained 6 months, during which time international situation might change in some way favorable to Austria.

Indirectly but reliably informed of views of their present left-wing leader. He does not expect immediate trouble from Austrian Nazis and believes that Austria will have some months of relative quiet during which Seyss-Inquart will be in constant and ineffective conflict with Skubl. There will be frequent threats of resignation from Seyss-

Inquart and in due course another crisis in relations with Germany.

General consensus is that Schuschnigg deserves sympathy and admiration for manner in which he came out of Berchtesgaden ordeal. It is felt that he yielded minimum and rendered great service to Austria and peace of Europe.

Pending Hitler's speech of February 20 and clarification of attitude of Austrian Nazis it is impossible to make any forecast.

This evening's press announces that the new Austrian Minister of the Interior, Seyss-Inquart, arrived in Berlin this morning for a short visit and was received by Hitler. It is learned that he also saw Ribbentrop, and it is reported that the necessity was impressed upon him in both of these conversations of cleaning up in Austria what was described as Communist elements. It may be further noteworthy that he spent some time at the offices of the secret police.

The circumstance of a newly appointed member of the Austrian Cabinet who is known to be pro-German being thus in effect summoned to Berlin is construed here as sharply indicative of the nature of the new relationship between Germany and Austria.

The Foreign Office states that Francois Poncet is seeing Ribbentrop at 5 o'clock this afternoon. The appointment was asked for the day before yesterday, but Ribbentrop was unable to set an hour before this afternoon. Francois will request information concerning the exact significance of the meeting at Berchtesgaden on February 12 and will state that the French Government has a deep interest in whatever takes place in central Europe.

The British Ambassador in Berlin saw Ribbentrop on the 15th and made a demarche along the lines of the foregoing. He was told that the discussion at Berchtesgaden with Schuschnigg had been concerned only with removing the causes of difficulties which had arisen from the working of the Austro-German agreement of July 1936 and that a communiqué would be issued shortly giving all pertinent information (this was before the final decision of the Austrian Government had become known).

The French do not expect to receive any more satisfactory or enlightening response from Ribbentrop than was given to the British. They state, however, that the fact that this step has been taken in Berlin by both the French and British Governments has some importance as manifesting the interest of both Governments in what transpires in central Europe.

It seems clear, however, that the French and British action in Berlin has been taken mainly for the sake of the record out of a feeling that they could hardly afford to pass by recent events in complete silence.

In conversation today the Belgian Ambassador who served in Berlin before coming to Paris said that in his opinion the Austrian situation might easily have found a worse solution than the temporary one actually reached. Everyone knew that, in the absence of a determined stand by Great Britain and France, Hitler could seize Austria whenever he wanted to. As a matter of fact he had not seized Austria but had come to an agreement with Schuschnigg by brutal methods, it is true, under which Austria would be allowed to continue as an independent state for the time being at least. Kerchove attached great importance to the fact that Skubl as Undersecretary of the Department of Security is apparently to continue in control of the Austrian police and felt that this as well as other points which Schuschnigg is reported to have obtained indicate that there has not by any means been complete abdication in the face of Hitler's demands.

The same informant in the Austrian Legation advised us today that for the past few weeks Italy has assured Austria that in the event of German aggression against Austria Italy will mobilize. Italy has, however, at the same time urged Austria to temporize as much as possible with Germany in order to gain time and not put Italy in the position of having to take such action.

Our informant likewise stated that he had talked over the telephone to Vienna this morning and that it was his impression that Chancellor Schuschnigg would probably appoint Seiss-Inquart as Minister of the Interior and head of public security but would have the control of the government police taken away from the latter department and put under the Prefect of Police in Vienna; thus outwardly acceding to Hitler's demands but actually not doing so in that the latter's real desire was to have a Nazi sympathizer control the police.

SECRETARY OF STATE,

240, February 15, 3 p. m. Section One.

I have just discussed with Leger the situation created by Schuschnigg's visit to Berchtesgaden.

Leger said that Schuschnigg had informed the French Minister in Vienna very privately and confidentially that he had been received with the utmost brutality. Hitler had had three generals including Reichenau standing behind him throughout the conversation and had made the following four demands: (one) that the Austrian Government should declare an amnesty for all Nazis and permit those now in Germany to return to Austria; (two) that those Nazis who had been deprived of their pensions and positions because of their political affiliations should be restored to their pensions and positions; (three) that Seyss-Inquart should be appointed Minister of the Interior and given control of the entire Austrian police force; (four) that Austria should agree to take no action with regard to foreign affairs without previous consultation with the German Government.

Leger went on to say that Schuschnigg had returned to Vienna intensely depressed and that Guido Schmidt was doing his best to persuade Schuschnigg to accept these demands of Germany.

Leger made the obvious comment that the acceptance of these demands would mean the end of Austrian independence.

Section two. I asked if the French Government had taken any action in Vienna or given Schuschnigg definite advice. Leger replied that there had been no formal contact whatsoever between Schuschnigg and the French Minister since the former's visit to Berchtesgaden. The information which Schuschnigg had given the French Minister had been given most privately and Schuschnigg had not asked for advice nor had any been given him.

Leger went on to say that he did not know whether or not the French Government would decide to urge Schuschnigg to reject these demands. The question would have to be decided by Chautemps and Delbos after consultation with Chamberlain and Eden. The decision would in his opinion rest on the interpretation of recent events in Germany.

A message had been received from Francois Poncet giving what he, Leger, believed to be an accurate account of the genesis of the Berchtensgaden visit. Hitler's old Nazi friends had been urging him to give up the idea that he could acquire Austria by peaceful evolutions and to turn to the method of force. Hitler was most loath to use force because the generals of the Reichswehr had convinced him that the army would not be in condition to fight a major war against France and England for approximately another year. Hitler therefore had wished to make a last attempt to gain his objective by overwhelming Schuschnigg's will to resist.

Section three: He had had the three generals present in order to make it clear to Schuschnigg that if necessary there would be force behind his words.

An additional reason for Hitler's reluctance to use force or threat of force was the fact that during the present period of preparation of the German Army he wished to avoid any act which might produce a strong government of national defense in France and an intensification of British war preparations and incidentally an increase in American hostility to Germany.

Leger went on to say that both he and Francois Poncet were entirely convinced that if Schuschnigg should accept the first two demands of Hitler but reject the final two demands Hitler would not dare to use force. He would employ every means short of mobilization to make life uncomfortable and impossible for the Austrian Government but would not mobilize. Leger said that he was not sure that Chautemps and Delbos would agree with him in this diagnosis. It was possible to believe that Hitler would mobilize three or four divisions on the Austrian frontier and that Schuschnigg would be forced to give way at a moment of great European crisis.

Section four: If one adopted the latter interpretation, it would obviously be less dangerous to have Schuschnigg submit now rather than later. Leger said that there were indications that the latter interpretation might be the interpretation of the British Government. In that case France would do nothing.

Schuschnigg would have to be assured of at least moral support from France and England and perhaps also Italy in order to be in a position to resist.

Leger said that the French and British Governments would discuss the problem this morning. He added that Hitler had not delivered an ultimatum with a time limit to Schuschnigg and he believed that Schuschnigg would attempt to gain time by standing on his dignity for a brief space.

The Dark Prospect in Germany

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. DANIEL A. REED

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 31, 1948

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the foreign situation as disclosed by recent articles appearing in the press presents a problem of very grave concern to the American people. The gravity of the problem is emphasized by the recent disclosures with reference to our State Department. The prestige of our country has been lowered and the good name of the State Department has been stained by intrigues and conspiracies carried on by its communistic employees and officials.

I believe that the recent observations of Walter Lippmann, which he sets forth in an article published in the New York Herald Tribune, Thursday, December 30, 1948, are worthy of presenting in the RECORD so that Mr. Lippmann's article may receive a wider circulation than may be given to it in the press.

It is perfectly evident that under the present foreign policy of the United States the American people are being committed to present and future expenditures of such a colossal nature that not only will our material resources be sacrificed to the detriment of the next generation of American boys and girls but our present-day standard of living cannot long continue under such an orgy of waste and extravagance.

Under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am inserting the article, heretofore mentioned, written by Walter Lippmann:

TODAY AND TOMORROW

(By Walter Lippmann)

THE DARK PROSPECT IN GERMANY

There is now available the material for a preliminary estimate of the progress and the prospects of the policy which proposes to set up a German government west of the Elbe, and to make western Germany a viable economy within the European recovery program. Just when this policy was decided upon may not be known until the records and the memoirs of this period are published. But shortly after the break-up of the Council of Foreign Ministers held in London last autumn, the United States and Great Britain took the initiative, with France consenting reluctantly, in formulating the policy. Two conferences which were held in London during the winter and spring ended with the signing of the London agreements early in June.

These agreements, both those which were published and those which have not yet been published, were a body of general principles to be followed by the governments, and of instructions to Generals Clay, Robertson, and Koenig, designed to set up a regime for the Ruhr, and to create a German federal republic in western Germany, an occupation statute which would fix the legal relationship of this republic to the Western powers, and a plan by which western Germany was to become, with the help of Marshall aid, a productive and self-sufficient partner in the reconstruction of western Europe.

During the past six months much work has been done to put into practice the policy formulated by the London agreements. The Germans have been meeting in a constitutional convention, which they prefer to call the Parliamentary Council, and their deliberations are interesting and significant. The military governors have been negotiating the text of the occupation statute which will in fact be the supreme law of western Germany, and their disagreements are now for Washington, London, and Paris to resolve. Finally, we know the results of the currency reform, and there exists a plan, now in the hands of the Marshall aid countries, which is supposed to show how the economy of western Germany is to become prosperous and solvent.

These three parallel developments need to be studied together. When they are, not only those who have had great hopes but also those who had great fears of the policy of the London agreements, will find themselves asking not what will happen if the policy succeeds but what will happen, as seems so highly probable, if the policy works very badly indeed.

The Parliamentary Council at Bonn was opened last September with a speech by Prof. Carlo Schmid, the leader of the Socialists in the constitutional convention. Professor Schmid is the most influential member of the committee which drafted the so-called Chiemsee report, the preliminary working paper of the convention. (In western Germany the party division is rather definitely fixed at 40 percent Socialists, 40 percent Christian Democrats, about 8 percent Communists, the rest Conservatives.)

Professor Schmid told the council that the document they were going to prepare could not be a constitution: "The German people, being under an alien occupation, are not free to form such a constitution; on the contrary what they are going to do is imposed on them by external compulsion. Such imposed documents may be technically good but they are not, democratically speaking, constitutions." Then he exclaimed that "the revolutions of 1830," 15 years after the end of the Napoleonic wars, "were nothing but the revolt of the peoples of Europe against imposed constitutions."

Professor Schmid went on to tell the constitutional convention that since they were acting under external compulsion the government they would create could be only the apparatus of domination. "When a people," he said, "has to organize under alien rule and subject to its approval, it does not constitute itself unless it does so against the alien rule itself."

There we have quite candidly set forth, what the Germans, our strongly anti-Communist Germans in the western zones, think of this western German state we have invited, indeed, pushed them, to form. When Professor Schmid spoke in September, he had not seen the text of the occupation statute under which the government, in which his Socialist Party will be much the strongest element, is to live. When the western Germans see that statute, they will find set down in black and white the bald and inescapable fact that it is impossible to have democratic self-government under military occupation. It will demonstrate to the Germans that all power is reserved by their conquerors, and that they have no real power themselves.

So it would be idle to think, as some of the more naive of our officials do, that the new German Government, lacking real power, will take the responsibility for the solution of Germany's problems. The main concern of Germans who participate in this Government, as I have pretty good reason to know from intimate talks I had with a few of them, will be to prove to the German people that they are not collaborators, a Vichy government, and a collection of quislings.

One of the most eminent of the German leaders in our zone is already in the unhappy position where his son refuses to talk with him because the son feels that the father is working with the enemy who made such a shambles of almost every important German city.

This new government, we must realize, cannot have legal legitimacy or moral authority in the eyes of the great mass of the Germans. Yet it will be asked to govern a German territory in which all the economic and social conflicts and problems that exist in Great Britain, France, and Italy, are present in an infinitely more difficult form. There are about the same number of people in western Germany as there are people in the United Kingdom and, like the British, they must import a large part of their food and raw materials. Yet the British with their strong institutions, their great tradition of freedom and solidarity, their relations with the Empire and the Continent, are able to manage only with a sustained effort which is unique in the experience of free people. Anyone who thinks the Frankfurt government, if and when it is set up, can come anywhere near to duplicating the British effort should be given the Nobel prize for wishful thinking.

The fact is that the rise in German production following the currency reform last summer has already—I say this on the best possible authority—hit the ceiling fixed by the limitation of power and skilled labor. The rise was probably not so great as the official statistics said it was. For a considerable amount of German production used to go into the black market and was not recorded. Nevertheless, there has been a substantial increase. Yet western Germany, with a much larger population than in 1936, has now got only to 75–80 percent of 1936 production. That is quite insufficient to afford a satisfactory standard of life, and insufficient to prevent a new inflation despite the currency reform. It will take, I was told on the same authority, 3 to 5 years of heavy capital investment to raise the physical ceiling on German productivity.

The new government at Frankfurt will be born into trouble—compelled to live and deal with a German economy in which the standard of life is very low, and the struggle for existence bitter and ruthless among the industrialists, the workers, the peasants, and the salaried officials, teachers, ex-soldiers. What will the German politicians do, faced as they are sure to be by insoluble difficulties? They will, of course, blame the alien conquerors who live among them in remarkable comfort, and by German standards, with conspicuous luxury.

This tendency is already quite clearly evident. The governments of the laender, like all governments in Europe, are faced with the problem of inflation. The evasion of taxes and the faking of accounts have meant that since the currency reform, which made German money valuable again, only a small proportion of taxes has been collected. Without great authority and integrity of government it is hard to collect taxes, as we know from France and Italy. The German governments—and this will be even more pertinent to the central government at Frankfurt—do not have real authority. So what have the German newspapers and politicians done? The most obvious thing. They are making a campaign against the cost of the occupation, and there is reason to think that some of the states have shown deficits in their budgets in order to prove their case against the costs of the occupation.

This is only a straw in the wind. But I venture to say that by creating prematurely, and under humiliating conditions, a democratic German government to deal with impossibly difficult problems, we shall bring about two unhappy results.

We shall have made it almost inevitable that the ideas of democracy will be discredited once more among the rising generation of Germans.

And, as this misconceived experiment proceeds, we shall find that our relations with Germany become more and more an entanglement—though on a vaster scale and with more malignant consequences—like our entanglement in Greece.

For in Germany, as in Greece, we shall have to provide more support as our influence diminishes, and in the morbid condition which will result from our attempt to occupy a part of Germany and yet not to govern it, though we continue to rule it, we shall be sucked into the angry whirlpool of the German passions, which are the aftermath of nazism and of a defeat that has destroyed more of German civilization than it has of the German potential for violence.

The Pope's 1948 Christmas Message

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES J. KERSTEN
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 31, 1948

Mr. KERSTEN of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following Christmas message of Pope Pius XII:

Grave yet tender, like the testament and last farewell of a most loving father, were the words of the Divine Redeemer to His first vicar on earth: "Confirma fratres tuos" (Luke 22: 32), strengthen thy brethren. These words have not ceased to echo in our mind and heart since the day He willed, in His inscrutable design, to confide to our weak hands the helm of Peter's barque.

Although these immortal words are deeply engraved in the depths of our mind, they are impressed still more upon us whenever, exercising the apostolic ministry, we communicate to the hierarchy and faithful of the world the teaching, directives, and exhortations which are needed for the complete fulfillment of the church's saving mission and which must be suitably adapted to the ever-changing circumstances of time and place, while their substantial immutability is kept unchanged.

It is with singular and deep emotion that we experience the force of that divine command at the present moment when, beloved sons and daughters of the world, we are addressing for the tenth time our Christmas message to you at the end of a decade which, for eventful happenings, oppressive anxiety, and bitter woes, has not its equal in the course of human history.

Last Christmas, when we asked your prayers and cooperation on this same feast day, we expressed the hope that the year 1948, then about to begin, might be for Europe and for the whole society of nations tormented by so much disunion, a year of earnest reconstruction and the beginning of a rapid advance toward true peace.

Today, at the end of a year which began so hopefully, our paternal voice again invites you, the upright and thoughtful, the sincere Christians, to ponder over the present state of humanity and of Christendom, and to consider what plan should be adopted to advance sincerely and securely along the path pointed out by the exacting necessities of the times and by your own conscience.

Any clear-sighted person who has the moral strength and courage to look truth squarely in the face, even if it be painful and humiliating, must fully recognize that this year of 1948, which dawned full of high and well-founded expectations, appears now at its close to have arrived at one of those crucial points, where the path which previously disclosed pleasant vistas seems to pose instead on the brink of a precipice where pitfalls and dangers fill good and generous people with increasing anxiety.

Nevertheless, or rather for this very reason, beloved sons and daughters, while faintheartedness begins to overcome the minds even of the courageous, and doubts assail the most enlightened and determined men, we feel ourselves more than ever obliged to answer the divine command: "Confirma fratres tuos."

To all of you, even those at the extremities of the earth, we send as our Christmas greeting the words by which the prophet announced the work of redemption and the decisive victory of the reign of Christ: "Strengthen ye the feeble hands, and confirm the weak knees. Say to the fainthearted: take courage and fear not; behold your God * * * will come and will save you" (Isaiah 35: 3-4).

As the successor of Him to whom the divine promise was addressed, "I have prayed for you" (Luke 22: 32), we know full well that when the fight against the powers of darkness is most arduous and enters phases that are decisive and, humanly speaking, alarming, it is then that the Lord is all the closer to His church and to His faithful. Fully convinced and aware of this divine assistance, we remind all those who glory in the name of Catholic Christians of a twofold sacred duty indispensable for the bettering of the present condition of human society:

1. Unshakable fidelity to the heritage of truth brought to the world by the Redeemer.

2. Conscientious fulfillment of the precept of justice and love, necessary presupposition for the triumph on earth of a social order worthy of the Divine King of Peace.

We would fail in gratitude to the Almighty, giver of all grace and furnisher of every good, if we did not recognize that the year now coming to a close, despite all its anxieties and sufferings, was also rich in spiritual consolations, in happy experiences and encouraging success. It was a year in which the church among all peoples, and in every country and continent, has given unmistakable and splendid proofs of life and vigor, of activity and resistance, and of rapid progress. And those not only justify the brightest hopes in the spiritual field, but have also produced tangible results in the titanic debate in which the human race finds itself involved while struggling for its healing and its peace.

A glorious series of religious functions, of Eucharistic and Marian congresses, of important centenary celebrations and impressive gatherings, have proved to any impartial observer that neither the war nor its aftermath, nor the tenacity of the enemies of Christ in their discordant and destructive plans have been able to dry up or contaminate the limpid sources whence the church has drawn the life-giving strength for nearly 20 centuries. Everywhere there is a quickening and throbbing of life which strives especially among Catholic youth to bring the gospel truths and the salutary force of its doctrine into all the spheres of human activity; its aim is to help and save even those who up to the present have closed their hearts to such beneficent action with great loss to themselves.

The severe trials the church has undergone because of the war and its aftermath, the painful losses and serious injury she has sustained, have served only to give more comforting and encouraging proof of her energy and resistance. Tossed about by the storm and waves, she has kept intact and inviolate her vital fiber. In all those countries where to profess the Catholic faith really means to suffer persecution, there have been and there are still thousands of valiant men and women who, undismayed by sacrifices, proscriptions, and torture, and fearless in the face of prison and death, do not bow the knee before the Baal of might and power (3 Kings 19: 18). Their names are unknown for the most part to the general public, but they are written in indelible characters in the annals of the church.

It is for us a duty to honor those faithful, valiant people, these tireless, courageous chosen ones, who are blessed by God. For them the hardships of the present time, the sorrows and the maternal tears of the spouse of Christ are neither a stumbling block nor foolishness, but an occasion and a stimulus to show forth—not in words but by actions—the integrity and unselfishness of their purpose, their unflinching fidelity and the sublime generosity of their hearts. Words fail to pay a worthy tribute and extol in a fitting way the heroism of these most faithful among the faithful. To each one of them we express our praise and our gratitude. The Lord, who promised to remember before His Heavenly Father those who confessed Him before men (Matthew 10: 32) will be their eternal recompense.

If the constancy and steadfastness of so many brethren in the faith is a source of joy and holy pride for us, we cannot pass over the obligation of mentioning those also whose thoughts and sentiments bear the imprint of the spirit and difficulties of the times. How many have suffered harm, and how many have been shipwrecked in their faith and in their very belief in God. How many, carried away by a wave of secularism or hostility toward the church, have lost the freshness and the serenity of a faith which up till then had been the support and the light of their lives. Others, violently uprooted and torn from their native soil, wander aimlessly about, exposed—particularly in the case of the young—to a spiritual and moral ruin, the danger of which it would be impossible to overestimate.

The maternal eye of the church follows with watchful love and redoubled care the souls of those temporarily lost or in danger. She is not angry. She prays, not condemns. She waits. She is waiting the return of those children of hers and is anxious to find means of hastening that hour. That is why the church shrinks from no sacrifice, finds no trouble too burdensome to such an end. She is ready for everything, except one thing: That she be not asked to gain the return of the children who have left her—either in the distant past or recently—at the expense of any diminution or tarnishing of the deposit of Christian faith confided to her keeping.

It seems to us that a brief clarification is opportune with respect to some harsh statements against the Catholic Church and the Papacy uttered by certain dissidents. Our duty of charity and of love is certainly not lessened by attacks or by insults. We know how to distinguish between the people, often deprived of freedom, and the systems that rule them. We are cognizant of the servile dependence that some representatives of a religion called orthodox display toward a concept of life whose ultimate goal—repeatedly proclaimed—is the elimination of all trace of Christian religion.

We are not unaware of the harrowing path that must be traveled by many of our beloved sons and daughters whom a public system of violence has driven to cut themselves formally away from the mother church to which their deepest convictions united them. With profound emotion we admire the heroic steadfastness of some; with deep sorrow and unfeigned paternal affection we witness the spiritual anguish of others whose external resistance has given way under the excess of unjust pressure and outwardly accepted a separation which their heart abhors and their conscience reproves.

Fidelity to the divine patrimony of truth confided to the church does not in any way condemn the Catholic Christian—as not a few believe, or seem to believe—to an attitude of diffident reserve or cold indifference in the face of the grave and urgent duties of the present hour.

On the contrary: the spirit and the example of Our Lord, who came to seek and save what was lost; the commandment of love, and, generally speaking, the special significance that radiates from the good tidings; the history of the Church which proves how she has always been the stanch and constant support of every force for good and for peace; the teaching and exhortations of the Roman Pontiffs, especially in the course of recent decades, dealing with the conduct of Christians toward the neighbor, society and the State—all this serves to proclaim the believer's duty to take his share, generously, courageously, and according to his station and capacity in questions that a tormented and agitated world has to solve in the field of social justice, no less than on the international plane of law and peace.

A convinced Christian cannot confine himself within an easy and egotistical isolationism, when he witnesses the needs and the misery of his brothers; when pleas for help come to him from these in economic distress; when he knows the aspirations of the working classes for more normal and just conditions of life; when he is aware of the abuses of an economic system which puts money above social obligations; when he is not ignorant of the aberrations of an intransigent nationalism which denies or spurns the common bonds linking the separate nations together, and imposing on each one of them many and varied duties toward the great family of nations.

The Catholic doctrine on the state and civil society has always been based on the principle that, in keeping with the will of God, the nations form together a community with a common aim and common duties. Even when the proclamation of this principle and its practical consequences gave rise to violent reactions, the Church denied her assent to the erroneous concept of an absolutely autonomous sovereignty divested of all social obligations.

The Catholic Christian, persuaded that every man is his neighbor and that every nation is a member, with equal rights, of the family of nations, cooperates wholeheartedly in those generous efforts whose beginnings might be meager and which frequently encounter strong opposition and obstacles, but which aim at saving individual states from the narrowness of a self-centered mentality. This latter attitude of mind has been largely responsible for the conflicts of the past, and unless finally overcome or at least held in check, could lead to new conflagrations that might mean death to human civilization.

Since the cessation of hostilities men have never been so obsessed as today by the nightmare of another war and by anxiety for the peace. They alternate between two extremes. Some adopt the ancient motto, not completely false, but which is easily misunderstood and has often been misused: Si vis pacem para bellum; if you desire peace, prepare for war. Others think to find safety in the formula: Peace at all costs.

Both parties want peace while both endanger it: On one side by arousing distrust, on the other by promoting a security which can prepare the way for aggression. Thus both, without wishing it, compromise the cause of peace at the very time when the human race, crushed under the weight of armaments and in agony at the prospect of fresh and even worse conflicts, shudders at the thought of a future catastrophe. Hence we should like to point out briefly the characteristics of a real Christian will for peace.

1. The Christian will for peace comes from God. He is the God of Peace (Romans 15: 33); He has created the world to be an abode of peace; He has given His commandment of peace, that tranquillity in order of which St. Augustine speaks.

The Christian will for peace has its weapons too. But its principal arms are those of prayer and love; constant prayer to the Father in heaven, Father of us all; brotherly love among all men and all nations, since all are sons of the same Father who is in heaven; love which, with patience, always succeeds in being disposed and ready to achieve understanding and agreement with everyone.

These two arms have their source in God, and when they are lacking, where people only know how to wield material weapons, there can be no real will for peace. For purely material armament necessarily awakens distrust, and creates what amounts to a climate of war. Who, then, can fail to see how important it is for the nations to preserve and strengthen the Christian way of life, and how grave is their responsibility in the selection and supervision of those to whom they entrust the immediate control of armaments?

2. The Christian will for peace is easily identified. Obedient to the divine precept of peace, it will never turn a question of national prestige or honor into an argument for war or even for a threat of war. It is very careful to avoid recourse to the force of arms in the defense of rights which, however legitimate, do not offset the risk of kindling a blaze with all its tremendous spiritual and material consequences.

Here, likewise, the responsibility of the nations is perfectly clear with respect to the paramount problems of the education of youth and the molding of public opinion, which modern methods and instruments render so sensitive and changeable today, in every department of a nation's life. But this influence must be carefully exerted to support the common interest of all states in the defense of peace. Every violator of the law should be banished in disgrace to. solitary confinement by civil society, as a disturber of the peace. May the United Nations Organization become the full and faultless expression of this international solidarity for peace, erasing from its institutions and its statutes every vestige of its origin which was of necessity a solidarity in war.

3. The Christian will for peace is practical and realistic. Its immediate aim is to remove, or at least to mitigate the causes of tension which aggravate the danger of war morally and materially. These causes are, among others, chiefly the comparative scantiness of national territory and the want of raw materials. So instead of sending foodstuffs, at enormous expense, to refugee groups, crowded into the best place available, why not facilitate the emigration and immigration of families, directing them to countries where they will find more readily the food they need?

And instead of restricting production, often for no just reason, why not allow the people to produce to the limit of its normal capacity and so gain its daily bread as the reward of its own labor, rather than receive it as a gift? Finally, instead of setting up barriers to prevent one another's access to raw materials, why not make their use and exchange free of all unnecessary restrictions, especially of those which created a harmful situation of economic disparity?

4. The genuine Christian will for peace means strength, not weakness or weary resignation. It is completely one with the will for peace of Eternal and Almighty God. Every war of aggression against these goods which the divine plan for peace obliges men unconditionally to respect and guarantee, and accordingly to protect and defend, is a sin, a crime, an outrage against the majesty of God, the Creator and Ordainer of the world.

A people threatened with an unjust aggression, or already its victim, may not remain passively indifferent, if it would think and act as befits Christians. All the more does the solidarity of the family of nations forbid others to behave as mere spectators, in an attitude of apathetic neutrality. Who will ever measure the harm already caused in the past by such indifference to war of aggression, which is quite alien to the Christian instinct? How much more keenly has it brought home to the "great" and specially to the "small" the sense of their insecucurity? Has it brought any advantage in recompense? On the contrary, it has only reassured and encouraged the authors and fomentors of aggression, while it obliges the several peoples, left to themselves, to increase their armaments indefinitely.

Resting for support on God and on the order he established, the Christian will for peace is thus as strong as steel. Its temper is quite different from mere humanitarian sentiment, too often little more than a matter of pure impression, which detests war only because of its horrors and atrocities, its destruction and its aftermath, but not for the added reason of its injustice. Such a sentiment, under a hedonistic and utilitarian disguise, and materialistic in its source, lacks the solid foundation of a strict and unqualified obligation. It creates conditions which encourage the deception resulting from sterile compromise, the attempt to save oneself at the expense of others, and the success in every case of the aggressor.

This is so true: neither the sole consideration of the sorrows and evils resulting from war, nor the careful weighing of the act against the advantage, avail to determine finally, whether it is morally licit, or even in certain concrete circumstances aggression by force of arms.

One thing, however, is certain: the commandment of peace is a matter of divine law. Its purpose is the protection of the goods of humanity, inasmuch as they are gifts of the Creator. Among these goods some are of such importance for society that it is perfectly lawful to defend them against unjust aggression. Their defense is even an obligation for the nations as a whole who have a duty not to abandon a nation that is attacked.

The certainty that this duty will not go unfulfilled will serve to discourage the aggressor and thus war will be avoided or, if the worst should come, its sufferings will at least be lessened.

In this way, a better meaning is given to the dictum: "si vis pacem pare bellum," as also to the phrase "peace at all costs." What really matters is the sincere and Christian will for peace. We are compelled to it surely by the following considerations: The spectacle of the ruins of the last war, the silent reproach which rises from the great cemeteries where the tombs of the victims of war are marshaled in endless ranks, the still unsatisfied longing of prisoners and refugees to return home, the anguish and dereliction of many political captives, worry of unjust persecution. But we ought to find a still greater incentive in the potent word of the divine commandment of peace—the gently penetrating glance of the Divine Child in the manger.

Listen to the admirable words of the Apostle of the Gentiles ringing out in the night like the bells of Christmas—He too was once a slave to petty prejudices of national and racial pride, laid low with Him on the road to Damascus: "He (Christ Jesus) is our peace: He has made the two nations one * * * killing all enmities in His own person * * * coming, He announced the good tidings of peace to you who were afar off, and of peace to those who were near" (Ephesians 2: 2, 14, 16, 17).

Hence at the present hour, with all the power at our command, we conjure you, beloved sons and daughters of the entire world: work for a peace that is in accordance with the heart of the Redeemer.

Together with all upright men who, even though not fighting in your ranks, are united with you in the community of this ideal, work strenuously for the propagation and triumph of the Christian will for peace.

It is, however, with special confidence that we turn to Catholic youth. The unforgetable demonstrations of last September brought to Rome, in an unprecedented multitude, the representatives of Catholic youth from the most diverse nations. They gave unmistakable proof of their solidarity in the will for peace.

From the steps of our patriarchal Vatican Basilica, on that occasion we blessed in paci: the house of peace, calculated to give to the youth of the Catholic world gathered in front of the cupola of St. Peter's a realization that they belong to one great family which embraces all its sons with equal love.

To you, young people, who bear in the flower of your age the responsibility of a tomorrow still so uncertain, we say: Be not content with building the domus pacis on the Via Aurelia. That is, only by devotion and determination in making of the world itself a domus pacis, over which the spirit and the promises of Bethlehem may reign serenely, can afflicted humanity find peace at long last.

With this hope we invoke the protection of the Most High on all peoples and nations, especially on these who more than others are exposed to the threat of war, to unrest, and to devastation.

And on this Christmas eve, why should our thought not turn back once again to the land of Palestine, where the Son of God made man spent his earthly life; to that Palestine where, even after the suspension of hostilities, there is still no sign of a secure basis for peace? May a happy solution be finally found which will mean help for so many thousand unhappy refugees and satisfy at the same time the anxious desires of all Christendom to see the holy places protected by making them freely accessible and safe, by means of the establishment of an international regime.

We implore likewise the divine assistance on all who are pleased to dedicate themselves to safeguard and promote peace by their prayers and active cooperation: on the rulers of nations, on those who can exercise a real influence on public opinion, and in general on those from whom people are more disposed to welcome sincere invitations to peace; on the innumerable ranks of war victims and on the many others whose unhappy lot becomes each day more painful as the intolerable waiting continues for a peace that is conclusive, morally just, and lasting, and immune from all superstitions and prejudices of race and blood.

Meanwhile, counting on divine grace to realize these ardent desires, we lovingly impart to you all, beloved sons and daughters, who are united with us in the bands of faith and love, our paternal apostolic benediction.

The Illfare State

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 31, 1948

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am inserting an article entitled "The Illfare State," which was written by Wheeler McMillen for a recent edition of the Pathfinder:

THE ILLFARE STATE

Have you heard about the "welfare state"?

That's a name the political philosophers have dreamed up for a kind of nation where a kindly government solves everybody's problems.

In the welfare state, no one stays sick for want of medical attention. The Government pays doctors and provides hospitals to look after the people's ailments.

In the welfare state, no one is supposed to lack a suitable place to live. If there are not enough houses, the Government builds them.

In the welfare state, no youngster has to be stinted on education. The Government sees that he gets plenty of schooling.

In the welfare state, no one has to sell products of his work at a loss. The Government supports the prices.

In the welfare state, no one has to work for very low wages. The Government prescribes minimum wages.

The welfare state sounds like a fine place in which to live. A great many millions of people have been persuaded that it must be indeed so.

All of these costs, of course, are met by the Government. Well, not exactly by the Government. The Government collects taxes from the people, and pays the bills out of the taxes.

Not all out of this year's taxes, of course. The bills tend to run high, so the Government has to borrow money. Naturally it borrows from the people, who therefore owe it to themselves, and no damage appears to be done.

Well, maybe a little damage. When Government has to borrow a lot of money, and when the people do not seem to be able to buy all the bonds, the Government has to sell the bonds to the banks. The banks issue money on the bonds. The Government spends the money.

Of course, the money all goes into the streams of business so that the wage earners and the material suppliers get it, and they can spend it.

Naturally a lot more money gets into circulation. People like that. That is, they like having lots of money. The only trouble is that when there is so much money around it takes quite a bit to buy anything. Money gets to be cheaper than goods.

The Government, of course, can fix that. It puts price ceilings on more things.

That makes a bit of trouble, too. The producers who can't make money under the price ceilings won't be reasonable. They demand subsidies, or quit producing and try something else.

When the producers quit producing, somehow the supplies of whatever they produced grow scarcer and scarcer. Black markets show up, where only rich people can buy.

So what? The Government can fix that, too. It proclaims rationing, so that the scarce supplies will be evenly divided up. People buy with ration coupons, plus money, the coupons being the more valuable of the two.

If that doesn't cure the trouble, somebody just has to go without. And the workers who got wages from the producers who quit have to find other jobs, if there are any.

When things get bad enough the Government really takes a hand. It drafts labor. It says, "Hey, you! You work over here. You work over there."

It takes over the businesses—the mines, the railroads, the utilities, the factories, the farms—and runs them. I mean runs them.

All these things have happened lately in countries not out of this world.

They couldn't happen there, could they? They aren't happening here, are they?

And if they did, would you call this a welfare or an illfare state?

Political Collaborators With the Present Soviet Regime Are the Instigators of an All-Out World War III

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES J. KERSTEN
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 31, 1948

Mr. KERSTEN of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, modern communications, transportation, and weapons make us one world. India, China, Russia, Europe, and America now make one neighborhood. The polar region is main street for modern man. For the first time since the building of the Tower of Babel man is being driven toward concerted actions. Jet propulsion and nuclear fission brings us all within the sight of the whites of each others' eyes. For many centuries we were dispersed amid the confusion of tongues and the separation of continents. But now we are forcibly drawn together. Mankind is being integrated into a single body. Many parts of that body, however, are sick. One part is cancerous. The cancer is the present regime in power in the Soviet Union. It is the first government in history based on militant atheism. In its forced labor camps it has inaugurated the most extensive system of human slavery that the world has ever seen. Its children are being raised in a dynamic hatred of the Western World. The present Soviet Government has dedicated its people to the overthrow of civilization as we know it. What is to be done, therefore, with this raging cancer that seeks to infiltrate into the bloodstream and to overcome the entire body of humanity? You cannot collaborate with a cancer. You cannot ignore it. It is a living malignancy; it is not benign. The greatest boon to mankind would be for the Russian people to overthrow the tyranny that enslaves them, for the world can never be at real peace until the present Soviet regime has been changed. You cannot cooperate with Communists in trade-unions, in government, or in councils of nations. A hundred years ago we could probably ignore the Soviet dynamic for aggression. But science has brought us all in the same neighborhood.

Those so-called statesmen that would have us ignore the cancer are the greatest instigators for an all-out world war III. Those social reformers that want us to collaborate with the present Soviet Government and ignore its malignancy are like the quack doctor who prescribes a pink pill for a serious illness that can be fatal. We know now, to our sorrow, that glad handing and infectious smiles make no impression on the men in the Kremlin. In dealing with them we are dealing with cold malice and Alice-in-Wonderland politicians they regard as fools. So, Mr. Speaker, we must understand the terror that has been thrust into the neighborhood of the world. That is the first step toward isolating it and preventing its spread into a general conflagration. Let us not mistake its malevolent purpose. Let us not compromise with it. Let us not aid and abet its conquests. Let us not add to its strength by a foolish ignorance of its aggressions. The modern world cannot exist half Communist and half free.

Down the Road to Nationalization of American Industries

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 31, 1948

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I have watched the operation of the socialistic government in England with deep concern because it is our taxpayers who are making it possible for the British socialistic government to function.

I believe it will function so long as we are willing to pour millions of our dollars to support the very type of government which we have condemned and paid for with both blood and money.

Under leave to extend, I am inserting an article by Mark Sullivan which appeared in a recent issue of the New York Herald Tribune:

BRITAIN SOCIALIZING INDUSTRY DESPITE DEPENDENCE ON UNITED STATES AID—MARK SULLIVAN CITES CONSERVATIVE CRITICISM OF LABOR GOVERNMENT'S NATIONALIZATION OF IRON AND STEFL, CITADEL OF NATION'S CAPITALISM

(By Mark Sullivan)

WASHINGTON, December 23.—A major condition of the current world and major influence on its future can be put in a question, "To what extent has Great Britain gone Socialist and how much further is it likely to go?" The question, in addition to its world interest and historic importance has a special interest for the United States—as the leading country practicing private ownership of industry, and also because of our relation to Britain through the Marshall plan, by which we aid economic recovery in that and other European countries.

An answer to the question may be found in a debate which took place in the House of Commons last month, on nationalizing the iron and steel industry. Throughout the debate there was frequent reference to the group of industries already nationalized—they include coal, transportation, electric power, gas, overseas cable and wireless, civil aviation, as well as the Bank of England.

Based on this socializing that has already taken place, a leader of the Conservative Party, Oliver Lyttelton, said: "If we add the state ownership of iron and steel * * * in reality private industry will have ceased to exist effectively." There will be private ownership, but it will be a feeble and shrinking thing. To the same effect a Labor leader, Minister of Supply R. G. Strauss, said that the socializing of steel removes from the private sector of our economy to the public the industry which is the citadel of British capitalism.

Other members of the Labor government confirmed what they regard as the necessity of socializing iron and steel if the Labor Party's program is to be consistent and successful. Ronald Mackay said that the Labor Party had come into power because it believes in socialism; and S. N. Evans declared: "No Labor government concerned about its future can possibly afford not to nationalize iron and steel."

Confirmation of the effect of the bill came from a great liberal paper opposing it, the Manchester Guardian: "The natural outcome of the steel bill is now becoming convincingly clear: there is no point after this at which the advance toward the extinction of private enterprise in British industry could be halted."

Throughout the debate in Commons, and in public discussion outside, there was frequent allusion to the fact that the British Labor Government is socializing British industry at a time when the country is dependent upon economic aid received from the United States, a country which practices private ownership and believes in it. A liberal periodical, the Economist, of London, said that we have never raised this point: "Americans have been meticulous in not intervening in our domestic political concerns." But the Economist counseled restraint on the part of the Labor government: It is surely only common prudence not to do anything, if it is not strictly necessary, that might compromise the future of the Marshall plan.

Conservative leader Winston Churchill was blunt in stating the dependence of Britain on the United States. He said that consideration of the bill to nationalize the steel industry ought to include consideration of the relation of that country to the United States, on which the Socialist government and the Socialist policy are living from month to month and from hand to mouth.

The implication was frequent that even though we do not raise the point, the British Labor Government ought to take into account the future effect which nationalizing of British industries would be likely to have on the United States and its economic system.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALT HORAN
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 31, 1948

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I would like to include the following statement by Mr. Charles E. Cone, research man for the Columbia Basin Commission in the State of Washington. Some idea of the potential of the Columbia River is contained in this statement. Since the Columbia River is one of the Nation's greatest assets, I thought my colleagues would enjoy reading Mr. Cone's statement.

IT WOULD REQUIRE 23,500,000 TONS OF COAL OR 93,750,000 BARRELS OF OIL TO PRODUCE POWER POTENTIAL OF COLUMBIA

(By Charles E. Cone, research man for Columbia Basin Commission)

Falling water of the Columbia River drops 1,290 feet from the international boundary to the Pacific Ocean. Through and over Grand Coulee Dam in an average year rolls 75,000,000 acre-feet of water. If all that energy increased by added water from tributaries could be used, the river would have a power potential of 5,000,000 horsepower or 11,200,000 kilowatts of electric energy throughout the year. It is not possible, however, to use the floods for power generation nor to pass all the water through the power penstocks as it is needed.

Estimates made by Maj. John S. Butler, in his famous report of 1932 concluded that 11 dams which might be built on the Columbia River would justify installing 8,200,000 kilowatts of generating capacity. Assuming that these generators can deliver power at 50 percent of capacity the year round, the Columbia River could furnish power at the rate of 36,000,000,000 kilowatt hours per year, or enough electric power to serve the entire Nation for 6 or 7 weeks at current rate of use.

Translation of these kilowatt hours into tons of coal or barrels of oil required for equivalent power generation brings the following results:

1. Steam power plants use 1.29 pounds of coal for each kilowatt-hour of electric power, to produce 36,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours of power would require 47,000,000,000 pounds, or 23,500,000 tons, or 6,000 trainloads of coal.

2. Oil is used extensively as a fuel for generating electricity by steam engines or by internal-combustion motors. One barrel of oil will produce 384 kilowatt-hours of electric energy. If we divide 36,000,000,000 by 284 we arrive at a figure of 93,750,000 barrels of oil which would be required annually to produce the estimated hydroelectric capacity of the Columbia River.

On the lower Snake River four dams have been authorized and Hells Canyon Dam between Weiser and Lewiston, Idaho, is in the study phase. If these five dams are eventually built with the proposed installations of nearly 2,000,000 kilowatts of additional generating capacity, the total energy potential of the two rivers can be set at 10,000,000 kilowatts installed capacity and the reader can add 20 percent to the tons of coal and barrels of oil above-mentioned.

Of course the above figures are wholly theoretical. In practice the demand for power, regulation of river flow, and the expense of construction of so many dams with a vast network of transmission lines will govern the future plans of the engineers. It was less than 100 years ago that Michael Faraday was experimenting with the first dynamo, then only a plaything for physicists.

Statehood for Alaska

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES J. KERSTEN
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 31, 1948

Mr. KERSTEN of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I would like to state that it was my privilege this past fall to visit our Territory of Alaska. A visit there will convince any reasonable person of the advisability of extending statehood to it.

The new importance of the polar region, the proximity of Alaska to the Soviet Union, the fact that the great circle air route to the Orient lies along the Aleutian chain, these and other reasons require the strengthening of Alaska. Statehood will be the first important step in the strengthening of Alaska. It will then be able to retain a just portion of its natural wealth for its own development. The days of its exploitation should be at an end.

Preliminary Report of the Subcommittee To Investigate Questionable Trade Practices on the Investigation of Retail Automobile Sales in the Metropolitan Area of Washington

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. W. KINGSLAND MACY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 31, 1948

Mr. MACY. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following preliminary report of the Subcommittee To Investigate Questionable Trade Practices on the investigation of retail automobile sales in the metropolitan area of Washington:

At the closing of the Eightieth Congress, I wish to comment briefly on the work of the Subcommittee To Investigate Questionable Trade Practices, of which I have had the privilege of being chairman during the past year.

The activities of the subcommittee have centered around three major subjects: (1) Steel, (2) scrap, (3) automobiles.

Very definite results have been accomplished in the first two fields and are set forth in the interim report of the subcommittee issued in October 1948, which report is incorporated herein by reference.

1. STEEL

As you know, that report contains certain recommendations directed to the steel producers, the scrap industry, and to the manufacturers. These should be followed up with representatives of the steel producers, the scrap industry, and the interested trade associations, to determine which of these recommendations should be adopted and put into operation. Indications are that the majority of the recommendations are feasible and could form the basis for voluntary programs to be carried out by the steel industry.

One matter which I feel should be brought to your attention involves the M. S. Kaplan Co. and the Sun Steel Co., of Chicago. These companies have common ownership. Because the committee had received numerous complaints relative to the gray-market activities of the Sun Steel Co., an effort was made to obtain certain information relative to its method of operation. Every effort was made to obtain the voluntary cooperation of the officials of the company. When this proved unproductive, the committee was forced to issue subpenas duces tecum ad testificandum. The United States marshal at Chicago made proper service upon two of the officers of the company. These officers willfully refused to appear before the committee, as directed. We have referred this matter to the Committee on Public Works, with the recommendation that the necessary steps be taken to properly deal with this flagrantly contumacious conduct.

2. SCRAP

The report also points out that although our scrap reserves are somewhat improved, they are by no means adequate in the event of war. In my opinion, the United States has not received a sufficient allocation of the ferrous scrap located in Germany surplus to the needs of that country. Ways of increasing this tonnage should receive immediate attention. The matter of sufficient reserves of scrap is, of course, directly related to the elimination of the steel gray market, and is extremely important from the standpoint of national security.

3. AUTOMOBILES

During the time that this subcommittee was making its investigation of the gray market in steel, it received numerous complaints relative to the existence of gray-market conditions in other industries. A great number of these concerned themselves with trade practices of retail automobile dealers. Information received from all sections of the country told of purchasers' difficulties in obtaining new cars, of premium prices which had to be paid, of unwanted extras, of the undervaluation of trade-ins, and other grievances. Many such situations were also brought to my attention by my colleagues. These complaints reached such proportions by July of this year that the committee felt impelled to embark upon an investigation of the automobile situation and do as thorough a job as possible consistent with rather severe limitations as to funds and personnel.

It was decided, from the standpoint of economy and speed, to make an investigation of the sales practices of the new-car dealers in the metropolitan area of Washington, D. C. The committee was also reasonably certain that conditions in this area were very similar to those existing in other comparable areas throughout the country.

The committee initiated its investigation by requesting certain information from a cross section of the automobile dealers in the area. Thirty dealers selling the various makes of automobiles were chosen. Each one was requested to submit certain information to the committee covering their sales for the first 7 months of 1948 in order to show the following:

1. The number of new cars sold.
2. New-car purchaser.
3. Motor and serial number.
4. Sale price, including accessories.
5. List price.
6. Used car taken in trade (if any) and identification of this car.
7. Allowance on used car.
8. Sale price of used car.
9. Purchaser of used car.

Upon receipt of the above information, it was analyzed in order to determine their methods of operation. Our investigation covered approximately 60 percent of the new-car sales in this area for the period from January 1, 1948, through July 31, 1948. In order to obtain the most accurate picture possible, the committee ran out approximately 16,000 new- and used-car transactions. Based on these investigations and the material submitted by the automobile dealers, the committee arrived at the averages and conclusions set forth under items I and II of the attached Summary of Information Submitted by Automobile Dealers.

It was also found that 80 percent of the automobiles taken in trade were "wholesaled" by the new-car dealers to used-car dealers without making any repairs. Most of these cars were sold to out-of-State dealers.

The committee also found that the methods of operation employed by various dealers differ considerably. For comparative figures, refer to items III, IV, and V of the attached summary.

In arriving at the average undervaluation of trade-ins, the committee considered only the difference between what the dealer allowed for the car and what he resold it for, deducting, of course, any repair expenses. However, as stated above, we found that 80 percent of the trade-ins were sold on the wholesale market and many of the cars passed through the hands of three or four used-car dealers before being sold to an individual for personal use. The market price on the car was considerably higher than the price placed on it by the new-car dealer and, therefore, a more accurate picture of the undervaluation would be obtained by subtracting the amount which the individual was allowed on his trade-in from the amount for which the last used-car dealer sold the car to a private purchaser.

Since it appeared that the trade practices existing in this area were the same throughout the country, the committee projected its findings on a national basis and arrived at the conclusion that during the first 7 months of 1948 the American public had in effect sustained a loss of $200,000,000 resulting from undervaluation of used cars taken in trade and $250,000,000 resulting from having to take unwanted extras.

Immediately following this announcement, the committee was deluged by letters from all over the country complaining that our estimates were entirely too low. In most instances the writer would thereupon state in effect, "Let me tell you what happened to me," and would thereafter set forth his story.

In order to illustrate some of the main types of questionable trade practices which had been discovered, the committee held a series of hearings. The first hearing involved the Kearney Oldsmobile Co., of Washington, D. C. Our analysis of the figures which they submitted to the committee shows the following:

New-car unit sales	231
Dollar volume	$539,749.89
Average list price	$1,967
Average delivered price	$2,336.58
Average dollar extras	$369.58
Total dollar extras	$85,372.89
Percent of extras on list price	18.78
Number of trade-ins	25
Total allowances	$12,901.20
Ratio of trade-ins to new-car sales—percent	10.82
Average allowance	$516.05
Average resale price of trade-ins	$1,005.53
Total trade-in sales	$25,163.25
Average percentage of resale price over allowances	95.04
Average profit on trades	$490.48
Dollar profit on trades	$12,262.05

However, since they greatly undervalued their trade-ins, the committee questioned the correctness of figures which reflected very few such transactions. Further investigation of the activities of this company showed that false information had been submitted to the committee. We found that some customers were making cash payments averaging $500, in addition to the invoice price of the car, and that such additional payments were not reflected on the books of the company. Eighty-five percent of the company's sales of new cars which we investigated showed that they had taken trade-ins which they had failed to include in the information submitted to the committee. In addition, these trade-ins were not reflected on the books of the company. These books merely showed that the new-car purchaser paid cash. However, it developed that instead of cash he had actually traded in a used car and the cash item was in truth and in fact the amount which he had been allowed on the trade. In many such cases the purchaser endorsed the title to his old car in blank. These cars were then sold by the Kearney Oldsmobile Co. at an average profit of $490, which was not reflected on the company books. In such a case the certificate of ownership filed with the District of Columbia Motor Vehicle Department failed to show that the car had ever been owned by the Kearney Co. Because of the manner in which the books and records of this company had been kept, all information developed by the committee was turned over to the Bureau of Internal Revenue, the Corporation Counsel's Office of the District of Columbia, and the tax assessor for the District of Columbia.

The committee made inquiry into the activities of the New York Avenue Motors (Hudson dealers), of Washington, D. C. In this case we developed that the son of the owner of the company was selling cars to customers who were willing to make cash payments under the table. These cash payments averaged approximately $400 per car. In one instance we found a veteran attending school under the GI bill who, in order to get a car, paid to George Adlung, son of the owner, $1,200 in cash and received a receipt for only $800. The balance of the car was financed in such a way that the former GI had to pay $90.48 a month for the next 2 years.

The next hearing held by the committee showed how three Chevrolet dealers distributed their cars among their customers. We investigated the activities of the Ourisman Chevrolet Co., Mandell Chevrolet Co. (both owned by Benjamin Ourisman), and the Kenyon-Peck Chevrolet Co. In these cases we found that the companies had long waiting lists of customers who had placed their orders and had made down payments in order to secure delivery of an automobile. We found that in the case of Ourisman deliveries to such customers were running 14 to 18 months behind. However, customers who were willing to trade in a car at a price greatly under its current market value could obtain a car within an average time of 50 days. In many instances such customers obtained practically immediate delivery. We found that the Ourisman Co. had 1,710 customers on its waiting list. If deliveries had been made in chronological order, all of these customers who had deposited money with the Ourisman Co. in good faith would have received their cars long since. As a matter of fact, the Ourisman Co. received a sufficient number of cars in the first 7 months of 1948 to enable it to fill the order of nearly every customer on the list had it so desired.

A somewhat similar situation was discovered at Kenyon-Peck. However, the committee found that in this case the dealer was circumventing his list of deposit customers by titling 80 percent of his new cars in the name of the company and then reselling them as demonstrators. In this way it was hoped to pacify irate customers who might complain that they knew of someone who had obtained speedy delivery of a new car from Kenyon-Peck. The company felt it could then clear itself by stating that it was not a new car but a demonstrator. As in the case of Ourisman, we found that Kenyon-Peck's deliveries to its deposit customers were running approximately 14 months behind. However, those customers to whom demonstrators were sold obtained almost immediate delivery.

The last hearing which the committee held involved the Cherner Motor Co. (Ford dealers), of Washington, D. C., and the Shirlington Motor Co. (Lincoln-Mercury dealers), of Arlington, Va. Both of these companies are owned by Joseph Cherner.

In this case as in others we found numerous customers on the waiting list who had placed deposits with Cherner a year and a half to 2 years ago. Some had been on the waiting list as long as 3 years. However, while these people were waiting, Cherner salesmen were soliciting new customers who had cars which they were willing to trade in at a price far below their actual value. At the time the Cherner books were examined the company had approximately $27,000 on deposit from those customers. In the past this had run as high as $40,000. These deposits were used by the Cherner Co. as part of its working capital. The order blank which the customers signed at the time they made their deposits required Cherner to place the deposit in trust. However, the Cherner Co. never complied with this part of the agreement and frankly so admitted to the committee. Mr. Cherner stated, however, that in 1946, the Ford Co. suggested that these funds be placed in a separate account. Mr. Cherner advised the committee that he told the Ford Co. that he would secure these deposits with $75,000 which he had in various building and loan companies in this area. He stated that this satisfied the Ford Co. However, an examination of these building and loan accounts showed that the moneys contained therein in no way secured the depositor account, and in the event the firm went into bankruptcy the depositors would only share with the rest of the creditors. Although the Cherner Co. paid no interest to its depositors, nevertheless, the building and loan accounts which were supposed to secure the deposits were paying him an average of 3 percent per annum.

In each of the hearings referred to above factory representatives of the automobile manufacturer involved were invited to attend. Following the disclosures by the committee, the Oldsmobile division of General Motors Corp. announced that the franchise of the Kearney Oldsmobile Co. was not being renewed. Within a week after our hearings involving the New York Avenue Motor Co., the Hudson Motor Co., of Detroit, announced a new sales policy which would guarantee to the public an opportunity to buy Hudson automobiles at list price without any extras or optional equipment.

The Chevrolet division of General Motors and the Ford Motor Co. at the present time are studying the evidence adduced at our last two hearings. However, although they have intimated that certain of the practices disclosed do not meet with their approval, we have not been advised to date as to what action, if any, they intend to take.

From the investigation which we have made and from an analysis of the complaints we have received throughout the country, it appears that abuses in the automobile-retail business fall into the following main categories:

1. Disregard of order lists.
2. Demanding premium payments.
3. Requiring trade-ins.
4. Undervaluation of trade-ins.
5. Loading cars with unwanted accessories and extras.
6. Discourteous treatment.

The committee feels that these abuses could be corrected without delay either by cooperation between the dealers and the manufacturers or by the insistence on the part of the manufacturers that the dealers conduct their business pursuant to a code of fair business practices. The committee feels that the manufacturers have not been sufficiently diligent in policing their own industry. While they have sought to soothe the public and build good will by announcing their policies relating to fair distribution and sale of automobiles, most companies have made very little real effort to see that these policies were put into practice. As was pointed out in the hearings dealing with the Kearney Oldsmobile Co., Kearney's name led the list in endorsing the pledges of the Oldsmobile Division of General Motors to deal fairly with the public. When this fact was brought to the attention of Mr. Raymond Kearney, he stated "that was meant for some other dealer, not me."

The public has long since recognized that in many instances such pledges are not worth the paper on which they are written; and, from the complaints we have received, it appears that the public is becoming more than annoyed at being treated like children in this matter.

Automobile manufacturers, by veiled reference to antitrust cases, take the position that there is nothing they can do to correct the abuses which exist in the industry. However, I feel that their position is open to serious question. I know of no Federal law, regulation, or decision which forces automobile manufacturers to renew the franchise of any dealer whose sales practices injure the reputation and good will of the manufacturer and bring his product into public disrepute.

I have never been in favor of Government controls. However, I recognize the danger to our national economy and our national safety inherent in all trade practices which add to inflation at the present time. When I make that statement, I am referring not only to trade practices in the field of automobiles but in all other basic industries. We have passed the point where such gouging skims off what merely might be termed "wartime savings." It has now reached the point where many must borrow against future pay checks in order to purchase current necessities. This is a most dangerous road to be traveling today, since it leads directly to economic collapse, unemployment, and bread lines, all of which provide a most fertile field in which seeds of communism flourish. I feel that it is high time for American industry to recognize these immediate dangers, and to take all measures consistent with our heritage of free enterprise to correct these abuses. I feel that a far better and more effective job can be done by industry itself if it sincerely desires to do the job. I recognize that in a normal competitive market such policing would be unnecessary. However, during this present period of war-created shortages, it behooves us all to conduct our business with that restraint dictated by good business practices founded on sound economic principles.

It is rather apparent that some dealers are looking forward with anticipation to the demise of the subcommittee. As a matter of fact, the officers of one automobile firm in this area have deliberately left this area to evade service of process and thus not have to produce their books and records. Consideration is being given to the advisability of requesting the issuance of bench warrants, because of this very deliberate interference with the work of the subcommittee.

SUMMARY OF INFORMATION SUBMITTED BY DEALERS

At the outset of the subcommittee investigation of sales practices of retail automobile dealers in the metropolitan area of Washington, certain information was requested from 30 new-car dealers, and subsequently from 7 more dealers. The material submitted set forth the following data for the period January 1, 1948, through July 31, 1948:

(a) Number of new cars sold.
(b) Name of purchaser.
(c) Motor and serial numbers.
(d) Sale price, including accessories.
(e) List price.
(f) Identification of used car taken in trade, if any.
(g) Allowance given.
(h) Resale price of used car.
(i) Name of purchaser of used car.

This information covered more than 60 percent of the new cars sold in this area for the first 7 months of 1948.

An analysis of this material revealed the following information:

I. The number of new cars sold by individual dealers ranged from a low of 50 to a high of 1,376.

(5) Percent of extras over list price	15.08
(6) Number of cars taken in trade	3,805
(7) Total allowances	$2,870,375
(8) Ratio of trades to new-car sales (percent)	40
(9) Average allowance	$754.37
(10) Average resale price	$1,087.14
(11) Total resale amount	$4,136,555
(12) Average percentage of resale price over allowances	43

(14) Total profit on trades	$1,266,180
(15) Average used-car profit per dealer	$42,206

III. Dealers selling the same make of automobiles often differed considerably in their dealing with the public, as can be seen from the following comparisons:

Results of 1948 Election in Hawaii an Overwhelming and Emphatic Endorsement of Immediate Statehood for Hawaii

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH R. FARRINGTON

DELEGATE FROM HAWAII

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 31, 1948

Mr. FARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include portions of a radio address that I delivered to the people of all Hawaii—Hawaii nei—on the results of the election in the Territory of Hawaii on November 2.

Restricted as it was to the choice of only one official from the Territory as a whole, the Delegate to Congress; to only the legislative officials of the Territory and to the officials of the Territory's four counties, the election commanded intense interest among the people of the Territory. More than 85 percent of those qualified to vote, cast their votes.

The results of this election hold great significance to the people of Hawaii, so far as their future is concerned. The address in which these results are discussed follows:

Friends of Hawaii nei: On the three successive Sundays preceding today I have talked to you over this same broadcasting system about the general election.

I return today to the same microphone to express my appreciation for my reelection to Congress and to discuss its relationship to our fight to win statehood for Hawaii.

I believe the overwhelming majority of the people of the Territory of Hawaii voted for my reelection because they approve of my record and the basic policies that have governed the conduct of the office of Delegate to Congress from Hawaii during my incumbency.

More than 75,000 persons cast their votes for me. This was more than three-fourths of the total vote cast throughout the Territory. In many precincts the proportion of votes cast for my reelection was even higher. I received the majority of votes cast for this office in every precinct on Oahu and in all but a few isolated precincts of the other islands.

ELECTION ENDORSEMENT OF STATEHOOD

It is clearly evident from this that the great majority of Hawaii's people, Republicans and Democrats alike, people from all walks of life, supported my reelection.

This is an expression of confidence that I accept not only in gratitude, but in humility. You of Hawaii have entrusted me as your only representative in the National Government with a great responsibility. I accept this responsibility with the earnest hope and solemn prayer that I will be able to discharge the duties of this office in a manner which will bring new and greater benefits to Hawaii nei.

I regard the vote cast for my reelection as an overwhelming and an emphatic endorsement of immediate statehood for Hawaii. In view of my record on this issue, the platform on which I stood for relection, and the emphasis I gave to the importance of the outcome of the election to statehood, I believe the vote cast for my reelection is a clear-cut mandate to carry on the fight for immediate statehood for Hawaii with all possible vigor in the forthcoming Congress.

The wishes of our people on this question are unmistakable.

HAWAII WANTS STATEHOOD NOW

I will tell Members of the Eighty-first Congress which will be convened in Washington shortly after the first of the year that we of Hawaii want statehood now; that we have outgrown the limitations of the Territorial form of government; and that we are now fully prepared to assume the responsibilities of statehood, to elect our own governor and such other executive officials whose names may appear on the State ballot, to choose our own judges by some appropriate method, to elect two United States Senators and two voting Members of the National House of Representatives, and, finally, to participate on the same basis as all other Americans in the next Presidential election.

I am confident that I voice the sentiments of the great majority of our people when I express the hope that the results of our election and the investigation that was being carried on at that time will answer the doubts of those who contended that communism constituted an obstacle—and the only obstacle—to immediate statehood for Hawaii.

COMMUNIST THREAT ANSWERED

While the people of the States were returning the Democrats to power in a landslide of votes, the people of Hawaii last Tuesday voted overwhelmingly to place Republicans in undisputed control of our Territorial legislature. I cannot see how, in the face of this record, anyone can contend with justification now that communistic influences constitute a threat to the government of Hawaii.

I believe, moreover, that the men and women elected to our legislature, and to our city and county offices as well, are, without regard to their party affiliations, a credit to the people of Hawaii and to our common country. They are good Americans—all of them—and well qualified to discharge the responsbilities of their offices.

The results of this elction show that the people of Hawaii are not yielding to communistic influences and that they are fully capable of meeting these influences wherever and whenever they arise in Hawaii—certainly as well as their fellow Americans in the States.

Moreover, the record of the last war should be proof enough of the loyalty and character of our people.

I say, therefore, that there does not remain a single good reason, fancied or real, for delaying further the admission of Hawaii to the Union as the forty-ninth State.

And I believe we should now join in bending every effort to win this objective in the next Congress.

PRESIDENT SUPPORTS STATEHOOD

There is no question as to where President Truman stands on this issue. He has twice recommended to Congress the enactment of legislation providing immediate statehood for Hawaii. The Interior Department has been among the most aggressive and effective advocates of this legislation. President Truman will undoubtedly make this recommendation to Congress again.

And his election will enhance his position with Congress immeasurably. He won the greatest personal political triumph in American history in his election last Tuesday and with it the admiration of every American. He will therefore enter upon his new term with a measure of cooperation, in Congress and out, that springs from the realization of all of us that we must be united in meeting the grave problems that confront us today.

The Democratic national platform on which he won this great victory, moreover, carries a plank favoring immediate statehood for Hawaii.

It is to be hoped that both of these factors will prove to be a determining influence on the new Congress on this question. I would not be frank with you if I did not point out under this leadership in the Seventy-ninth Congress, the legislation providing statehood for Hawaii did not make very much progress.

The Seventy-ninth Congress, the Congress before this one, was controlled by Democrats.

LARCADE SUBCOMMITTEE REPORTED FAVORABLY

In his message on the state of the Union to this Congress in January of 1946, President Truman recommended immediate statehood for Hawaii. The Larcade subcommittee, following an extensive investigation here which most of you will recall, recommended very soon afterward immediate consideration of statehood for Hawaii by the then Committee on Territories. The chairman of the committee, however, refused to act, and the Seventy-ninth Congress came to an end with the legislation still pending before the committee. The chairman of the committee was supported in the position he took by the House leadership.

I hope that, in view of all that has transpired since that time, the leadership will reexamine its positions on the question. The position of the President, the plank in the Democratic national platform, the action of the House in passing the legislation in the last Congress, and the numerous investigations of this question since then certainly offer every reason why it—the leadership—should do so.

Certainly American public opinion cannot be ignored indefinitely on this issue, and American public opinion is definitely on our side.

The developments of the past 2 years prove this.

The American people are in favor of immediate statehood for Hawaii.

TRANSCENDS PARTY LINES

The issue is one, moreover, that transcends party lines. It involves important considerations of national policy. It is one that should be brought to some conclusion in the Eighty-first Congress.

We of Hawaii should be united in seeking this objective.

It will be my first purpose, therefore, as I return to resume my duties as Delegate to Congress from Hawaii to ask for immediate consideration of legislation to admit Hawaii to the Union as the forty-ninth State.

I hope that we will have the answer by next June at the latest.

I expect to return to Washington later this month so as to be there in good time to make preparations for the opening of the new Congress. I want those of my friends whom I will not have the opportunity of seeing personally—and this applies particularly to those of you who are on the other islands—to know that I will carry with me a lasting sense of appreciation for your interest in this campaign and in my reelection.

I am grateful for what it represents in friendship to me and loyalty to the best of our political traditions. It will remain in my memory as a constant source of inspiration as I return to Congress to take up again Hawaii's fight for equality.

Mahalo nui loa, and aloha.

Dr. John Tyler Caldwell

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAM HOBBS

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 31, 1948

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, December 11 last, the new president of Alabama College was inaugurated.

Alabama College is Alabama's great school, enrolling some 800 girls who joined with the faculty, the board of trustees, and official representatives of many other institutions of higher learning, and the officials of the State government, who formed the academic procession in welcoming Dr. John Tyler Caldwell.

Dr. Caldwell is the sixth president and is the worthy successor of five other distinguished educators.

In welcoming and pledging allegiance to the institution and Dr. Caldwell, Dean Napier stressed the ideal condition of unity which has long prevailed among faculty members and students, the absence of factions and cliques. He called attention to the strength of the faculty and the fact that—

The faculty members have studied in more than 50 different colleges and universities in this country and a number have studied in foreign institutions. The colleges in this country include Harvard, Yale, Princeton, Cornell, Columbia, Johns Hopkins, and Pennsylvania, on the east, to Stanford and California on the west; Chicago, Illinois, Iowa, Minnesota, Northwestern, Ohio, and Wisconsin, on the north, to the great colleges and universities of the South, including North and South Carolina, Duke, Emory, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, Tennessee, Texas, and those of Alabama. Approximately one-third of the faculty members hold one or more degrees from some Alabama institution.

Speaking in behalf of the State department of education, Dr. A. R. Meadows briefly sketched the career of Dr. Caldwell: Bachelor of science degree, Mississippi State College; taught in Holmes Junior College; master of arts degree, Duke University; doctor of philosophy, Princeton University; instructor, Vanderbilt University, 1939; joined Naval Reserve, 1942; served in the United States Navy 26 months, overseas, with 16 months on Okinawa; received Bronze Medal; separated from naval service as lieutenant commander, rejoining Vanderbilt University faculty; elected president of Alabama College, September 1947.

Superintendent Meadows appraised Dr. Caldwell:

Young enough to understand the problems of youth and mature enough to guide and aid in their solution.

Dr. Caldwell's inaugural was noteworthy:

THE NEW BIRTH

Governor Folsom, Dr. Meadows, Dean Napier, Mrs. Parker, Miss Pendergrass, members of the board of trustees, distinguished delegates and other guests, members of the faculty, students and friends, may I express my appreciation for the honor done to Alabama College by the presence of you delegates and visitors here today.

This ceremony, in which a new president of Alabama College is formally acknowledged and tendered the responsibilities of his office, touches me profoundly. I accept humbly the honor and responsibility. I pledge the board of trustees and the people of Alabama at this moment my high intent and earnest effort to administer the affairs of the college to the very best of my ability, as honestly as I can, and as nearly as I am able in accord with the principles of our great spiritual heritage of Christian living. More than this I cannot attempt. A lesser goal would be unworthy and would be a discredit to the hopes, faith, and labors of my distinguished predecessors, to these students, and to this faculty.

Delaying an inauguration for more than a year is not too good an idea from several standpoints. I do not commend it to President Draughon, Gallalee, and Norton.

But it affords me the opportunity of saying truthfully that I shall never be able to thank enough the wonderful staff and student body of this college for the tolerance, understanding, and earnest effort to help me get my sea legs on this voyage. They have been tolerant, they have been understanding, they have been invaluable in their help and advice. As my sea legs grow steadier, I have every confidence we shall retain the fine standards established under the leadership of Captain Reynolds, President Peterson, President Palmer, President Carmichael, and finally by my immediate predecessor, Dr. Arthur Fort Harman, who passed away on founder's day, October 12, this year. Let me not forget, I pray, that what Alabama College now proudly is, is the product of every girl, every teacher, every gardener, every dean, every president who passed this way and did their bit.

I have chosen as a subject for my remarks: The New Birth or Alice in Wonderland. Any resemblance of the subjects to recent events or newly arrived persons to this campus is entirely deliberate and premeditated on my part. If the recent arrival objects to having her name used here, she may sue her father when she comes of age in October A. D. 1966.

All here recall Lewis Carroll's sprightly and gentle classics, Alice in Wonderland and Through the Looking Glass.

Alice, a little blond-headed child, grown drowsy from picking daisies, was not greatly surprised to see a rabbit walk by, nor to hear him speak plain English. But when the rabbit pulled a watch from his waistcoat pocket, Alice, burning with curiosity (natural for a woman), just had to follow him to his hole.

At this point, as one who so recently has accepted a college presidency, I find myself sympathizing with Alice. For the story records, "In another moment down went Alice after it (the rabbit), never once considering how in the world she was to get out again."

President Draughton, President Gallalee, and President Norton (and our wives, God bless them) are among the more recent sympathizers who surely join me in a fellow feeling for Alice's venture down the rabbit hole.

I cannot refrain from saying here how much Alice in Wonderland at one place reminded me forcefully of Alice of Flowerhill. Shortly after Alice arrived in Wonderland, she wept a lake of tears and flooded the surrounding area. Then after she, the mouse, and others had arrived on dry land and sat for a time, the mouse asked Alice "How are you getting on now, my dear?" "As wet as ever," said Alice "It doesn't seem to dry me at all."

But I must begin soon what I have to say. You will remember that the mock turtle began his personal history with the command to Alice and her companion "sit down, both of you, and don't speak a word till I've finished." Then when nobody spoke for some minutes, Alice thought "I don't see how he can ever finish, if he doesn't begin." So, as the mock turtle finally did, I shall begin. (Not with his words, however, for he began, "Once I was a real turtle.")

The new birth has reference first of all to the scriptural passage in which Jesus said to Nicodemus, "Except a man be born again, he cannot see the Kingdom of God," and that, "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the Kingdom of God. * * * Marvel not that I said unto thee, Ye must be born again."

Secondly, the new birth refers to a passage in Lincoln's Gettysburg address, when he said: "That this Nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom, and that government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth."

Nations are reborn when its citizens are reborn, that is, when its people as individual men and women discover their innate sense of spiritual values, revamp their aims in terms of moral and ethical achievement, and assert their faith in the validity of kindness, gentleness, goodness, mercy, love, honesty, peace, and so on.

Finally, then, the new birth refers to the purpose and process of education which to all who participate in it, to teacher as well as learner, and at all levels, is the continual unfolding in the mental horizons of men and women of broader horizons, new insights, deeper meaning, purer loves, loftier ideals, better reasons for courage, more significant skills.

Such are the potentialities of education which make it worthy. A great head of this institution, Dr. O. C. Carmichael, now president of the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Learning, said recently that "education represents the cutting edge of progress." Indeed it is. If the findings of the physical sciences and social sciences are true, they will undoubtedly lead on and on, progressively, to man's high destiny toward which the humanists have already penetrated and dimly defined. But if these heights are to be reached by mankind, all men and women must see the goal clearer and find the paths more surely.

Goals are important, Alice found it so when she was confused and asked the Cheshire Cat, "Would you tell me, please, which way I ought to go from here?"

"That depends a good deal on where you want to get to," said the cat.

"I don't much care where—," said Alice.

"Then it doesn't matter which way you go," said the cat.

"So long as I get somewhere," Alice added as an explanation.

"Oh, you're sure to do that," said the cat, "if you only walk long enough."

Since education must take its goals from the society which it serves, let's have a look at our American society's goals. Or do they exist? And who established them? I know they do not exist alike in all of our thoughts. And I doubt that agreement is sufficiently widespread for the Nation as a whole to claim them. Perhaps the goals will just unfold as we go along. Perhaps I prefer not to adopt the Alice-in-Wonderland policy of just walking long enough to get somewhere. I like to see a goal ahead. Let it be an ideal, if you please. Thus we come squarely up to the question of who is to take the lead in establishing our goals. And, clearly enough, the answer is, "We are." You and I, each generation of us, will make some contribution to defining the goals, be they high ones or low ones. So those we educate today in our colleges will be setting goals tomorrow, or else we will just drift to somewhere. What then are our ideals here at Alabama College?

Let me speak for myself and trust that my friends and colleagues will not be too much offended.

Our goals here, as I see it, are, first, to assist each young woman who comes to us to find herself a beautiful creature of the Most High God endowed with wonderful and special talent; second, to assist her to find that her fellow man, regardless of race or creed, is her brother man, possessing dignity and inherent goodness, and that her most important talent to develop is her power to love that fellow man as she herself would be loved; third, to assist her in discovering that no part of existence is insignificant, but each contributes to the unity which constitutes being. Finally, to bring to her consciousness a sharper awareness of a universal cause, a universal order, and a universal destiny in which she is obliged to participate. This is a big job. But it is our job.

These are the goals of a liberal education. In the proportions they are achieved in our students, our society will be improved. Sometimes it might be wondered how, with our secularism and scientism, we can work toward these goals in our institutions of higher learning. The answer is again found in the essential unity of all true knowledge. If the physical and biological sciences appear to delve only into the secrets of the material universe, we can take confidene in the fact that the more we learn about that universe the closer we come to the truths about universal cause and universal order.

If the frontiers of psychology are progressively pushed back and its findings made known to men and women for everyday living, those who learn of it will discover perhaps but the ancient preachings of Jesus and Paul and John who admonished their hearers that the best psychology of all was to love one another, and who knew that hate, false pride, false knowledge, self-love and selfishness were the real demons of man's life, doing injury to his mind and body and society.

If the sciences of society—sociology, anthropolcgy, political science, and economics—are properly pursued, they will reveal the mechanics of a more orderly society, here and now, where the Golden Rule holds sway, in which man meets brother man and common objectives are worked out harmoniously and peaceably, in which wealth rewards honesty, nobleness, moral courage, and unselfishness and base motives are penalized. Here too the truths about mankind will begin to destroy the divisions in men's minds which separate people by artificial and superficial devices created out of selfishness, pride, ambition, hate, and most of all, by ignorance.

The pursuit of man's ideals, hopes, joys, tragedies and triumphs, in the literature, the drama, and poetry of our own and other tongues, inspires the student to formulate his own philosophy, inspires him—if truly taught—to identify his destiny with that of other men and seek a reconciliation of conflict. These accomplishments are not un-Christian. It is in the best tradition of our Hebrew-Christian heritage that these disciplines were developed and are available in order to free men's minds of ignorance, prejudice, and hate.

The arts help Jane and Ellen and Sylvia find the thrill of creating something meaningful and beautiful, and of doing it themselves. Jane learns to link her individual achievement with the possibilities of all men who are in the business of reflecting their Creator. She learns the thrill of producing beauty and grace in form or movement or sound or speech or color. These attributes are mental and spiritual, not materialistic. It is no accident that artists are passionate in their love of freedom. They know they would never have discovered themselves except in an atmosphere of freedom.

Do I omit the vocationalist? No, indeed not. To become an effective member of our economy is a worthy accomplishment and an obligation which educational institutions must support. I hasten to point out, however, that the liberally educated man or woman is best equipped to pursue successfully any vocation chosen and trained for. There is no home economist, no pianist, no laboratory technician, no physiotherapist, no social worker, no administrator, no teacher who wisely will omit the liberalizing value of the sciences and humanities from her formal education.

On all this I should say more. But I move on to ask: What kind of society then will these girls so educated want to establish? What will this kind of education cost? Will it be worth it?

I am amused as I lay out before you my ideas of society, for I think of Alice's saying to the White Queen: "There's no use trying, one can't believe impossible things." To which the Queen replied: "I daresay you haven't had much practice. When I was your age, I always did it for half an hour a day. Why, sometimes I've believed as many as six impossible things before breakfast." (Some older heads here may be thinking that of me now.)

The kind of society our Alabama College education is calculated to produce will have several characteristics.

First, it will be a free society, in which the individual's personality is the most important consideration. Happy, well-adjusted persons will be the principal objective of public and private endeavors. Freedom to worship, think, read, investigate, and to speak will not be questioned.

Second, it will be a just society, in which the standards of success and reward will be honesty, service, intelligence, unselfishness, and responsibility.

Third, it will be a secure society, in which a wife and husband can build a family and a home free from fear, secure in the knowledge that theirs and their children's future will not be penalized because of society's failure to function with reasonable order and responsibility.

Fourth, it will be a society of opportunity, in which a person with intelligence, initiative, energy, responsibility, skill, courage, and foresight will be rewarded for his useful accomplishments that benefit his fellow man.

Fifth, it will be a society at peace, in which the growth of international understanding will have overshadowed the divisions among men and the psychology of love will have supplanted fear, ignorance, and hate.

Finally, it will be a happy society shaken loose from sordidness, tawdriness, and shallowness, finding inner resources more joyous, more sustaining, uplifting, and relaxing than what today passes too often for entertainment and which is really a spoliation of character and standards.

I do not know whether the government of our new society will have three branches or not. I do not know whether or not there will be a National Labor Relations Board or a TVA or a Federal Trade Commission or a State utilities commission or Federal aid to education or not. I do not even know whether individual-enterprise capitalism will be part of the new society or not. These are all devices which one generation of citizens has thought necessary and later generations may retain, modify, or abolish. I happen to believe them all to be extremely useful devices now for moving toward our ethical goal which is not well defined. What is important—and perhaps the only thing about the organized social order that really matters—is that the people of each generation always must be free to change it and adapt it to their chosen ends. This is the sine qua non of democratic accommodation, adjustment, and progress. This, incidentally, is what a free people will demand, and it places on the people a great responsibility.

The kind of education which free people require is, therefore, the very best the society can afford—no less. Chiefly we need our share of the ablest people of our society on the teaching staffs of our educational institutions from the kindergarten through the graduate schools. Faculties are at the core of the educational process. We cannot in our highly advertised society, where material well-being has become the standard of prestige and success, expect our ablest sons and daughters to choose a profession which requires its members to spend years and money in preparation only to find it difficult to raise and educate a family on the average expected income, much less to enjoy the ordinary material advantages of a car, home ownership, and some travel. It would perhaps be well to have every teacher of economics and related social sciences spend some time in the workaday world of business for maturity of viewpoint. But those who complain that the teachers of economics are "not practical" and that they are "undermining our system" cannot expect to purchase maturity, poise, wide knowledge, experience, and intensive training for from $2,500 to $4,000 a year.

Ladies and gentlemen, I put it to you as a proposition that if this State will dig deeper into its taxable jeans and plan better the over-all application of their dollars for higher education in the State, your sons and daughters tomorrow will call you blessed as will their sons and daughters. We want industrial and agricultural progress in this grand State of Alabama and in this great region of opportunity and we are getting some of it. But we constantly act as if education were just another cost of government. My friends, if you would reduce the breadlines of the future, if you would obliterate the Communist of the future, if you would eliminate the ugliness of your cities and rural slums, if you would raise the standards of your public servants, if you would increase the capitalization of your banks, if you would extend the number of home owners, if you would curb delinquency and divorce, if you wish this region to boom as it blossoms into the full splendor of a new day, educate your people.

I rather think, finally, that if we strive to do a proper job at Alabama College, and at all our sister and brother institutions, public and private, in bringing about a continual rebirth in the minds of each student of this generation, we shall bring about also a new birth of freedom and prosperity to this whole blessed land. How much will it cost? I did not ask. I only ask my hearers today if there is any task more important, or if there is any need more urgent. I only ask if we are doing all we can. Or whether we think education is just another item on which we can practice economy.

The words of John are applicable here: "I know thy works, that thou art neither cold nor hot: I would thou wert cold or hot. So, then, because thou art lukewarm, and neither cold nor hot, I will spue thee out of my mouth."

This generation cannot afford lukewarmness toward the moral issue of whether or not education is our most important public endeavor. Alice in Wonderland contains the final answer to the importance of education in today's battle of ideas. Tweedledee and Tweedledum were preparing themselves for their personal battle with each other. Alice was arranging a neck protector for Tweedledee to keep his head from being cut off. "You know," he said gravely, "it's one of the most serious things that can possibly happen to one in a battle—to get one's head cut off."

The Electoral College and the Election of 1948

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARENCE F. LEA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 31, 1948

Mr. LEA. Mr. Speaker, in 1928 I became firmly convinced that it is important to our Nation to modernize our method of electing the President. On January 25, 1928, I filed a joint resolution providing for the abolition of the electoral college, the retention of electoral votes to each State as at present, the direct election of the President by popular vote, and a division of the electoral votes of each State among the candidates in exact proportion to their popular votes within the State. On the 27th of January of that year I appeared before the House Committee on Elections of the President, which then had jurisdiction of such legislation, and urged the adoption of such an amendment.

In the Seventy-first and Seventy-second Congresses hearings at which I appeared were held by similar committees of the House, each of which unanimously reported the resolutions I proposed. Since that time I have repeatedly filed similar resolutions in each of the seven Congresses, with one exception. The Judiciary Committees of the Eightieth Congress of both the House and the Senate favorably reported similar resolutions. The same resolution is now pending before the two Judiciary Committees of both the House and Senate.

I am taking this opportunity of again urging the support of this plan of election of the President as a final act in my service of 32 years in the House. I am unh sitating in my conviction that the adoption of the amendment now pending, as a part of the Constitution, would be a very wholesome and substantial contribution to the welfare of our Government.

THE ELECTION OF 1948

The recent Presidential election has, in a rather striking way, again displayed to the American people the gross defects of our present system of electing a President. That election gives abundant evidence of its crudeness, its uncertainty, its injustices, its danger of throwing elections into the House of Representatives, its suppression of minority votes, and its inherent inability to reflect accurately the will of the American people.

In this election 48,680,416 votes were cast. Of this number Mr. Truman received over 24,100,000 votes and Mr. Dewey over 21,969,000. Mr. Truman's final plurality was about 2,133,000, or slightly less than a majority. This was a plurality of 4.4 percent of the popular vote as between him and Mr. Dewey. In the electoral college Mr. Truman had 303 votes of the 531, or 57 percent of the total. This was a variation of over 7 percent between the popular and the electoral votes. The average variation between the popular and the electoral votes of the last 10 elections has been about 18 percent. A distinct variation between the popular and electoral vote will always occur, because under the unit system of State voting there is no logical relation between the electoral vote and the popular vote.

A plurality of 1 vote can control the 47 electoral votes of New York with its 6,000,000 votes; the same as it controls the 4 electoral votes of Montana. A plurality of 1 has the same effect as a plurality of 500,000.

In the recent election there were 91 electoral votes in four States controlled by a margin of less than 1 percent; 78 of these votes went to Mr. Truman and 13 to Mr. Dewey. A uniform change of six-tenths of 1 percent of the Truman votes to Dewey in the three States Truman carried would have given the election in the electoral college to Mr. Dewey by a majority of 1 vote. A similar change in two of these States would have thrown the election into the House of Representatives with perhaps all the confusion and recriminations that characterized the three other instances in which the election of the President was left to the House of Representatives.

These results came within a hair's breadth of happening, notwithstanding Mr. Truman had nearly a majority of the popular votes when more than three candidates were running; he had a 4.4 percentage of the vote above his highest opponent; and the population represented by the votes he received were probably over 7,000,000 more people than were represented by the votes of his nearest opponent. Such a system of crediting votes serves no useful purpose.

Why should we maintain a system of electing the President that subjects the country to such hazards?

In the House of Representatives each State would have had only one vote, regardless of its population and the number of its Representatives.

This photo finish may be compared with the election of Cleveland in 1884 by getting the total electoral vote of New York by a plurality of less than 1,200, or with the election of Wilson in 1916, where a change of 2,000 votes in the one State of California would have given the election to Hughes, notwithstanding Wilson had a plurality of over 500,000.

In the recent election 85 electoral votes received by Mr. Dewey were carried by a plurality of over 1 percent and less than 2 percent. Thus, with 91 votes carried by a margin of less than 1 percent, 186 electoral votes were determined by an average plurality of about 1.1 percent of the popular vote. Over 48 percent of these votes, being all the minority votes in the States represented, were credited to the plurality candidate, even though he had only a minority of the total vote.

WINNING ON OPPONENT'S VOTE

This is a good illustration of the operation of the unit vote when three or more candidates are involved. In the election of 1912, where three candidates had sizable votes, each one of the candidates received more credit in the electoral college from the votes of his opponents than he did from his own votes. There is no logic or justice in such a method. This was an electoral monstrosity.

Mr. Truman was elected on account of receiving something over 14,000,000 votes in the States he carried. He received credit for about 10,000,000 votes for his opponents in those States. Votes cast for Truman in States he did not carry were credited in the electoral college to his opponents. He should have won on his own votes alone, but the unit count made that impossible.

Thus, we are operating under a system under which there are three methods of crediting votes:

In the first place, the winning candidate gets credit for the votes cast in his favor only in the States he carries.

In the second place, the plurality candidate in each State gets credit in the electoral college for all the votes cast for his opponents.

In the third place, every minority candidate in every State is denied credit in the electoral college for all the votes he receives in such State.

Such a system of computing votes in a national election is utterly absurd, and gives no assurance that in the ultimate result the Nation's choice will be elected.

I can think of no logical reason why every man's vote should not be counted in the ultimate result according to the way it was cast. I know of no legitimate reason why every candidate should not receive credit for his proportion of the vote of each State.

Under the electoral college system, if all the States should give a uniform plurality of only one-half of 1 percent to a plurality candidate, he would receive every electoral vote in the Nation, although he may have been a minority candidate. Of course this is not a practical possibility, but it illustrates the principle involved.

In the last 11 elections, in 78 instances minority candidates have received the total electoral vote of that many States.

THE PLURALITY SHALL ELECT

Where two or more candidates are running, there is no just reason why the plurality candidate should not win. There is no other practical method of selecting candidates for the Presidency; but he should win on votes cast for himself, and not on votes cast for his opponents.

In the electoral college a candidate cannot win unless he has a majority of the electoral votes. Frequently no candidate will have a majority of the popular votes, although he may have a majority of the electoral votes. Mr. Truman will be the fourteenth minority President, but he had a plurality of the popular vote which unquestionably entitled him to the election.

One weakness of the electoral college is that it requires a majority vote in the electoral college to elect. The lack of that majority, even by a candidate with a plurality of the popular votes which should clearly entitle him to election, cannot be elected except through the House of Representatives.

In the recent election there were 19 States which carried a total of 278 electoral votes by a margin of less than 5 percent as between the candidates. Of these, 116 were received by Mr. Truman and 162 by Mr. Dewey. There were 29 States with 253 electoral votes which were carried by candidates receiving pluralities of over 5 percent.

There were so many issues presented in the recent election that it is difficult to say how much support was given to any particular proposal. Of the total plurality for Mr. Truman of 2,133,000, over one-half of it was supplied by seven Southern States, including Oklahoma, which gave him a plurality of 1,208,822 votes. It seems to be commonly accepted that these States are in the main opposed to the President's civil-rights program and to the repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act. Anyway, here we have the plurality that may be construed on paper as in favor of all the President's proposals.

On the other hand, the industrial States which have the strongest labor unions gave their pluralities to Mr. Dewey instead of to Mr. Truman, who advocated civil rights and the repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Mr. Truman carried the industrial States of Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Illinois, and Ohio with their 73 electoral votes. Mr. Dewey carried the industrial States of Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Delaware, Indiana, Michigan, Pennsylvania, and Maryland with their 149 electoral votes. Thus, in these industrial States, with 222 electoral votes, Mr. Dewey received a majority of 76.

The votes of the Southern States and the agricultural sections were the predominating features of the election of 1948, based upon the pluralities involved. Twenty-eight States gave pluralities of 10 percent or less, and mostly much less. Twenty States gave pluralities of over 10 percent. Of these States giving pluralities of over 10 percent, four went to Thurmond, giving him a plurality of 631,000. Only two went to Mr. Dewey—Vermont and Maine—which gave him eight electoral votes. Of the States giving pluralities of over 10 percent, 14 went for Truman, carrying 156 electoral votes and a plurality of 2,216,011 popular votes.

One outstanding feature of the election is its demonstration that the voters of the Nation are exercising a greater independence and freedom from party bonds than ever before. A solid block of States in the North and West has practically ceased to exist, and a greater independence of the southern belt of States is in evidence

It is historically true that the unit voting system of State votes in the election of a President originated in the desire of political machines in various States to deny representation to minority voters in order that political leaders might control the whole vote of the State. That time is pretty much behind us. One of the clear needs of our time is to give minority candidates their just place in our system of computing the election returns for President.

In the last 10 elections preceding the recent one over 323,000,000 people had voted for President, and over 139,000,000 of those votes were credited for President in the electoral college contrary to the way they were cast. Such a system of counting votes has no legitimate place in a well-ordered, popular government.

The unit vote is a perversion of the original purposes of the Constitution. The system was made possible out of the provisions of the Constitution which did not permit the citizen to vote directly for President but required the election to be by Presidential electors. This results in the selection of Presidential electors in blocks—all pledged to one candidate.

The proposed constitutional amendment now pending in the two Houses would eliminate the Presidential electors and authorize the people to vote directly for President and to have their votes counted as cast. This proposal does not deprive any State of its voting power now granted it by the Constitution.

THE VOTING POWER OF THE STATE

Under the Constitution each State is given a definite assurance of its voting power among the States. It was intended that no State or group of States should prevent each State from having its legitimate representation in conducting the affairs of the Nation.

The Constitution, with an unimportant exception, provides that each State shall have representation in the House of Representatives in proportion to its population, which is determined by the census every 10 years. It also provides that each State shall be entitled to representation by two Senators regardless of population, and that no State can be deprived of such representation without its own consent.

The Constitution further provides that each State shall have electoral votes in the same number as it has Representatives and Senators in Congress. This means that each State has the same number of votes in electing the President as it has in Congress. These assurances to each State are among the checks and balances which the framers of the Constitution wisely provided to give stability to this Republic.

Each State, with minor exceptions provided in the Constitution, determines who its voters shall be and their qualifications. They may not be the same in any two States.

What the Constitution attempted to do in giving each State voting power in proportion to its population is to establish a common unit to give each State its appropriate relative strength, with every other State, in the selection of a President.

I have attempted, in detail, by presentation made in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the Eightieth Congress on June 16, 1947, July 16, 1947, July 18, 1947, July 22, 1947, and July 24, 1947, to show the reasons and justification for the constitutional provisions fixing the voting power of the States in the election of Presidents.

In substance, there are two rules under which the State exercises its voting power in the selection of a President. The first is that the State is entitled to electoral votes in proportion to its population.

The second is that each State is entitled to two electoral votes regardless of population. This latter provision was based on an agreement which made possible the establishment of the Constitution. It is one of the checks and balances of the Constitution intended to prevent the small States from being entirely submerged by the overwhelming power of the larger States.

The electoral vote, so far as it is based upon the population of a State, is an exact reflection of the will of the people of the State. The persons who vote in the State do so by the will of the State and represent its whole population. It was never expected or intended that the qualifications of voters in every State should be the same or that the same proportion of the population would vote in the various States regardless of the conditions that might confront them at the time of election. The basing of the unit of election between the States on their population was a way of giving them a definite place in the scheme of operating the Federal Government.

In fact, the voters of a State act in a representative capacity. In one State 25 votes may represent 100 people; in another State 40 votes may represent 100 people. Under such circumstances, the voter is not a common unit for the expression of public opinion as between the various States. The electoral vote, so far as based on population, is an exact and definite common unit between the States.

TWO VOTES REGARDLESS OF POPULATION

Manifestly, the granting of two electoral votes to each State regardless of population does not afford a common unit on the basis of population. It was never intended that it should.

The pending amendment does not propose to deprive the States of their present representation of two electoral votes corresponding to their two Senators. To abolish this provision would be about the same as to try to abolish the Senate, whose Members are not elected in proportion to population, but who, in the course of our history, have performed a useful service and justified their existence as one of the checks and balances of the Nation.

Under the unit system both of these electoral votes goes to the plurality candidate, if he has one or more popular votes above his highest opponent.

In the recent election Mr. Truman carried 28 States, for which he received 56 of the 96 electoral votes. Mr. Dewey carried 16 States with their 32 electoral votes. The proposed amendment, of course, would divide these two electoral votes in each State between the candidates in proportion to the number of their popular votes and not arbitrarily as now under the unit vote method.

If this proposed amendment had been in effect in the recent election, neither one of the candidates would have received the whole of these two electoral votes of any State. Under the proposed plan, Mr. Truman instead of receiving credit for 56 of these electoral votes would have received credit for 46.424; and Mr. Dewey, instead of receiving credit for only 32 votes, would have received credit for 40.142. Thus there would have been a shift, due to this different allotment of the electoral votes, of 19.718 votes. The change would, of course, have shown the exact proportion of the public sentiment of the voters as expressed at the polls.

In 1944 Mr. Roosevelt received about 51 percent of the popular vote of the country and 75 percent of its two-vote allotment. Had those two electoral votes been allotted according to the popular vote, Roosevelt would have had 54.167 and Dewey 40.801. Roosevelt's majority of the two electoral votes would have been 13.365 instead of 48. In other words, the difference in computing the two methods of crediting these votes would have been 34.634. That would have been according to the popular will instead of the arbitrary allotment under the unit-voting system.

So the division of these two electoral votes according to the popular votes goes a long way to minimize any criticism against the allotment of such votes regardless of population.

The sectional distribution of these votes, as I explained on page 20 of the hearings of the Judiciary Committee of the House on June 9, 1947, also greatly minimizes any criticism of the two-vote allotment; in fact, the two-vote allotment awarded on a proportionate basis between the parties greatly minimizes any objection that can be made to the proposed amendment.

It must be borne in mind that this two-vote allotment to each State is not an innovation proposed by the pending amendment. It is already in the Constitution and the amendment does not propose to change it. What this amendment does do is to eliminate its arbitrary allotment and make it exactly reflect the will of the people of each State, both for minority and plurality candidates. The present practice of awarding both votes to the plurality candidate is a perversion of the voting power of each State and an injustice to every other State as well as all minority candidates. The proposed amendment would more truly make the electorial vote a common unit between the States for an accurate expression of the public will.

The Eighty-first Congress will honor itself and perform a splendid service to the Nation if it submits the pending amendments to the States for ratification.

Void—If Detached

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. SAM HOBBS

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 31, 1948

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Speaker, it is with prideful pleasure that I invite your attention to the article written by a great man, my beloved friend, Dr. S. Waters McGill, of Fort Wayne, Ind., entitled "Void—If Detached":

VOID—IF DETACHED

"Void—if detached," everything is: Telephones, radios, lamps, busses, automobiles, etc.

"Void—if detached"—these words appeared on a railroad ticket which I held in my hand. They apply to sporting pasteboards, stubs for drawing at the county fair, and just about everything in this world of ours.

If you were to take about everything in this universe that is void (not good) if detached, and throw it into a pile you would dwarf a pyramid in size and the Washington Monument in height. Into that pile you would have to throw all telephones, sweepers, washing machines, refrigerators, and even radios upon which so many of us depend for amusement and information. Detach them from the socket, the source of power—at least the connection with that source—and they are useless.

It isn't any wonder really that we call all these things appliances. To be useful they must be applied. Into the pile you would have to cast all the parts of your automobile: Fenders, bumpers, carburetors, lights, wheels, distributors. Few if any of these things would be worth having without the others, Into that pile you would place glasses, knives, cameras, mirrors, drinking cups. Unless they are attached to some hand, some socket or cord they are useless. Void—if detached, is applicable to everything the hand of man has made.

We may go further and say that this simple phrase describes man himself. Christ's whole life was one long attempt to show the world that no man liveth unto himself. "I am the vine, ye are the branches" means attachment, not detachment. So does "I am the good shepherd." So does "I am the door." So does "Ye are the light of the world" and "Let your light shine." You would be void, says Christ, if detached. Everything in this world, made either by the hand of God or the hand of man, takes its value from its relationship to some thing or some one or other. No one thing by itself, even if it be what we call a perfect soul, has the slightest significance except it find its proper attachment.

So important did Jesus consider this truth, and so jealous was He for man's proper perception of it that he adds these harsh words which we have not yet quite fully believed: "Without Me ye can do nothing." He was not minimizing man's capacity. There was no scorn for man's eternal striving. And many of the things for which humankind puts forth its greatest energy were not to be condemned. If only, if only these children of God would get wise and relate their tasks, their desires, interests, abilities, and their possessions—all of them—to the ultimate source of their power and meaning.

Some of us are beginning to learn that money, gobs of it; or education, degrees of it; or security, mountains of it—are sometimes the most barren things in the world if they are detached from a motive or purpose of usefulness. Do we see that we ourselves run that same danger? Here we are, with a life on our hands, a whole rich human life in our hands with its infinite possibilities, and we keep frittering it away, running after things which, if we do secure them, can do very little for us and last only a moment at best.

"The worldly hope men set their hearts upon," mused Omar Khayyam, looking queerly at his perspiring fellows rushing about prodigiously in earnest. What is it even if it does come true? Like snow falling on the hot face of the desert. That's how futile life can be, whether it be a pagan philosopher or a Christian teacher who interprets it. Only one says there is nothing to be done about it. The other says "I am the vine, ye are the branches." "Abide in Me and ye shall bear fruit," and "Apart from Me ye can do nothing."

Now, let us make this a bit more specific. We are void—if detached from family ties. It is almost impossible to overestimate the importance of this. Where would you and I be without them? Those who guided our faltering steps in infancy, those who directed the first products of our minds into fruitful channels, those whose love not only sheltered us against the harshness of the world but developed in us the will to master it. It is a perfectly insipid truism to say that man is the most dependent of all creatures. But when you place that fact over the unquenchable thirst for independence you have a strange paradox on your hands. You, a self-made man? Never.

Thomas Hovenden put the story on canvas far better than we can put it in type or speak it. It is an old-fashioned home. A fine-looking young man, hat in hand, is saying "Good-by" to the family. He is going out into the world of his dreams, which he hopes and intends to conquer. The father, of course, is concealing his feelings by carrying the carpetbag out to the waiting carriage. Grandmother, sitting at table, seems to be dreaming of days gone by. The older sister stands thoughtfully by the mantel, and the younger one sits by the door, looking as if she was about to lose out of her life all that was really worth while. But the center of the picture is the parting of the mother and son. Her hands upon his shoulders and her eyes looking straight into his. She stands there erect in her composure, and you can almost hear the words of motherly advice being added to the blessings she is giving him. It is a beautiful picture. (It can be seen in a stained-glass window at the Fort Wayne YMCA, hidden on the first landing from the lobby, where few, if any, ever see it.)

The title of the picture is "Breaking Home Ties." But these home ties are not being broken. Wherever that young man went in the world these ties would hold him fast. He would not be void—if detached. That's what happened to the prodigal son—remember? True enough the ties were stretched, and his story is not what could be called a pretty picture. We know that without attachment his life would be void—if detached.

We are void—if detached from our friends. We may boast that it does not really matter about this thing of having friends. We can get by ourselves alone, we say. What other people think of us doesn't matter. That, of course, is all bluff and nonsense. Our very life belies our words when we say a foolish thing like that. We exist and thrive on friendship. There is not an incident in one's life which is not connected with friends. Some of us have jobs because of them.

How very dependent we are upon our friends. So much so that Dale Carnegie's book How To Win Friends and Influence People was a best seller, and still is. The cynic may say that our interest in our friends is based on what we can get out of them. Even in such cases our lives are influenced and we realize that we are void—if detached. We become fruitful when we are nourished by parents, loved ones, and friends. Friendship always carries with it certain fertilizing forces. Biographers are unanimous in relating how each period in the hero's life was ushered in by a new friend. When Schiller met Goethe every talent was awakened; Milton stands in the company of Cromwell; Dr. Johnson sits with his immortal group around a table in a London inn; David had his Jonathan; Tennyson his Hallam; Longfellow his Emerson. Friendship glorifies everything it touches in the lives of the obscure as well as the great. For the most part the soul dwells in a castle locked and barred against outsiders. No man can keep "open house" for every passer-by, but friendship is the "open sesame," drawing every bolt and bar, yielding power and spirit and courage and love. Every tree goes down before the storm; every ship with no anchor amidst the rocks is lost before the gale—but a human life, fastened in friendship and attached to love will never wither and be "void."

Then, too, there is the connection we must have with our country. Without it, who can say how void our lot would be. It isn't very often that we place much value on citizenship. When polls beckon, we give it a fleeting thought. When we are in a foreign land we have more reason to think seriously about it. Many of us have been in England, France, Germany, and some of us in Africa. There may be times for some of us when we sing in memory: "The sun shines bright in my old Kentucky home." There are times when we deprive ourselves of our rights by not voting. Of what use can we be to ourselves, to our community or our country? Dwight L. Moody, of the Moody Bible School, once asked a man how he was going to vote. The reply was: "I don't vote. My citizenship is in heaven." Whereupon Mr. Moody said, "Better bring it down for a few days because it is going to be needed." We are void—if detached.

It is obvious that when our rights are enjoyed we appreciate the value of citizenship; when responsibilities are to be borne, we at times deprecate that. The citizen is no doubt the recipient of services from his fellow citizens, enjoying benefits which the state confers upon him, heir of the social inheritance, protected by law, sitting in security under "his own vine and fig tree," "none daring to make him afraid." But the greater the benefit conferred upon him, the more extensive becomes his responsibilities. His security is granted to him, not that he may enjoy it in isolation but that he may have opportunity to serve his community. His rights are nothing without his duties. At no point do his rights relieve him of his responsibilities, they create them at every turn.

The ideal social system is sometimes represented as though it would automatically relieve him of his responsibilities. The citizen has only to put his ballot in the ballot box, as he would a penny in the slot, and the Government will do the rest. We sometimes think that this is just the system that would suit us. But in reality we could not endure it for a day. It would deprive us of our responsibility, and that is a thing a freeman will never surrender, for freedom does not mean to be detached from social responsibility. That simply is isolation and death. When General Booth, the founder of the Salvation Army, was in England he sent a cablegram back to America. It consisted of just one word, "Others."

The most pathetic story in modern prose is The Man Without a Country. The most dramatic story in modern history is the effort of a people without a country to win one. What would it mean to any one of us to be banished from the United States of America? We would be void—if detached. The most significant application of this truth concerns our lives and Christ. We are void—if detached from Him. He is the one who said: "Without Me, you can do nothing." Our Lord Christ never said anything more sobering as He looked into the face of mankind.

Even those who take life seriously, who have some idea of what it is for and try to make worthier use of it, at times accomplish but little, and they are completely dismayed. We see but we cannot reach. We stretch out our hands but come short. We hope, we strive, we pray; yet do what we will a whole brood of evils keeps storming our hearts. The things we hate to do disappear. The things we loathe won't yield, and though occasionally we breathe the clean air of the heights, a moment later we wake up in the stuffy plain, the same bedraggled and dusty figures we were.

"Yes," says Jesus, "I have been watching you, and you can't do anything, nothing that matters, at any rate, without Me. All your individual attempts are like fading branches torn from the vine, withered, collected, and burned." This judgment of His about our stupidity, foolishness, and helplessness is distressing and depressing. But there is a hopeful sign as well. It is this, "He that abideth in Me beareth much fruit."

It has been said, and wisely, that it is dangerous to base your theology on a metaphor. But this one is descriptive of Christ's own life. He looks at us and says, "You can do nothing. Detached as you are, you are no good. But with Me attached and abiding in your life you can be abundantly fruitful. Withered branches you may be today, but tomorrow I shall cover you with power and glory." How? Well, here is His answer, and very heartening it is. Sometimes it seems we have intellectualized religion too much, that in essence "it is very simple" says Christ. Simply by clinging to the vine. The vine does the rest. The vine even provides the strength to cling. So, continues Jesus, "If you will attach yourselves to Me, live with Me, look to Me, and learn of Me—I will make your lives fruitful." It is as simple as that, and we should believe it.

A brave man simply by being brave gives us courage. A wise man can steady us in our uncertainty almost without saying a word. And Christ—simply by being Christ can make us bear fruit. The big question is—Are we attached? Are we abiding in Him? Do we really pray? Do we really read His word? Is His will determining our plans? It is important to be attached. And the attachment must be continuous. We must abide. One of the prayers of the Apostle Paul included this: "That we may be rooted and grounded in the love and power of Christ." He knew that we would be void—if detached.

Carl E. Bailey

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BROOKS HAYS

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 31, 1948

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, on October 23, 1948, the Honorable Carl Edward Bailey, former Governor of Arkansas, died in the city of Little Rock. His untimely death brought deep personal sorrow to those of us who knew him as a friend and associate. As governor, he led a progressive movement that added materially to the State's resources. Carl Bailey was self-educated. Deprived of the advantages of a formal education, he was able through perseverance and disciplined study to achieve distinction as a lawyer and public official. His administrations as attorney general and governor will be remembered for their many constructive measures in behalf of our State's advancement.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following editorial which appeared in the Arkansas Democrat, Little Rock, soon after his death:

CARL E. BAILEY

There is an empty place in the front ranks of Arkansas leaders, with the passing of Carl E. Bailey. As prosecuting attorney, as governor, and as a private citizen, he contributed richly to the progress of the State. His fighting spirit and liberal mind equipped him to serve our people in the troubled, changing 1930's when he rose to high public office.

His work as prosecuting attorney was marked by vigorous performance of duty. The same forthright energy gave distinction to his two terms as governor, and bore lasting fruit in laws which aided the State's valiant efforts to surmount the depression of that period.

Governor Bailey saw with clear vision the need of protecting our natural resources, of diversifying our agriculture, creating industry and improving our schools. The legislature responded to his leadership with laws to aid these projects.

And when he left the governor's office, his active participation in the State's affairs continued. As a private citizen he served many worthy causes.

There is inspiration for youth, pride for maturity, in Carl E. Bailey's life. He came up the hard way, working as a laborer, farmer, bookkeeper, lumberman, then entering a busy career as lawyer, public servant, businessman and farmer. What his hand found to do, that he did, with a stout will, and made it serve his aim of climbing step by step to the top.

Arkansas is a much richer State for this courageous, useful life. And all of its people are poorer today for the loss of such a man while he was yet in the prime of his years.

Hon. Sydney Anderson

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARENCE F. LEA
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 31, 1948

Mr. LEA. Mr. Speaker, this House may well pause to note the passing of Hon. Sydney Anderson, of Minnesota, at Minneapolis on October 8, 1948.

Mr. Anderson was a native of Minnesota, where he was born on September 17, 1882. He was a private in Company D of the Fourteenth Regiment, Minnesota Volunteer Infantry of the Spanish-American War. For some years in his early life he practiced law. During his mature life, he engaged in many activities which gave him a varied, comprehensive, and practical understanding of the farming and business life of America. After his retirement from Congress, he served as vice president of the General Mills, Inc., at Minneapolis. Subsequently he was one of the original sponsors of the Transportation Association of America and later became its president.

In all his relations he manifested his predominating quality as a builder, an active devotion to constructive purposes and efforts.

He was elected to the Sixty-second Congress and six succeeding Congresses covering the period from March 4, 1911, to March 4, 1925, when he voluntarily retired.

While in Congress he served as chairman of the Agricultural Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry in 1921 and 1922. In the performance of that work he distinguished himself as an able, conscientious executor and statesman. The reports made by that Commission still have an outstanding place among publications relating to the agricultural problems of the United States.

Among other things, this Commission recommended that leaders of agriculture, industry, finance, and transportation create a public interest body to deal with the economic and public relations of all forms of transportation.

After his retirement from Congress Mr. Anderson worked unceasingly for the establishment of such an organization. In 1934 he assembled many leaders of business and finance to appraise the possibilities for usefulness of such an organization. As a result the Transportation Association of America was organized as a research and educational institution supported by a broad cross section of many elements of the Nation's economy.

In 1945, when I was chairman of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, Mr. Anderson called at my office and discussed the future problems of transportation. In substance, his view was that unless something is done to meet inevitable conditions before they arrive, times will come when it will be very difficult to maintain the adequate and efficient transportation this country needs. He stated he was not prepared to suggest what should be done, but there must be something that can be done to avoid these evil conditions before they are upon us. He solicited my interest and the interest of Congress in the problem. We conferred with various Members of Congress, particularly with the members of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, with the result that I offered House Resolution 318 of the Seventy-ninth Congress which provided for a national transportation survey which Congress approved and entrusted to that committee. This survey was further authorized by the Eightieth Congress and carried on under the able leadership of the chairman, Hon. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON. Doubtless that committee in the Eighty-first Congress, under the leadership of Chairman CROSSER, will continue its helpful interest and responsibility.

The Transportation Association of America is in a large way engaged in making a comprehensive research and survey of our transportation problems, including all types of carriers. This survey is unique in that every economic interest of the country is invited to take part and assist in aiding this survey, with a view to stabilizing and improving our transportation system to the ultimate benefit of both the carriers and the public which they serve.

Mr. Anderson gave a sincere and hearty loyalty to this effort. For many months he suffered with a certainty that the end was drawing near. As his final hour approached, he was busily engaged, with all his declining strength, in preparing a statement of things which, in his judgment, should be done for the benefit of the country in connection with this survey. When warned that he was exhausting his strength and should cease his effort, he replied, "No," that he must complete it. Suffering from pain and weakness, he insisted on giving the last ounce of his strength and the last moments of his life to the cause so dear to his heart. He finished his statement, and the stenographer who took the dictation went to the station to take her train, where she received word that Mr. Anderson had gone.

His devotion to this cause was characteristic of his service here in this House and of his lifetime activities. With him, the interests of his country had first place.
